The House may be familiar with some of the issues that I raise. I had an Adjournment debate about the second crossing two years ago, which led to the scheme being included in the 1998 review. I welcome my hon. Friend the Minister to the debate and look forward to explaining once more the reason that the new crossing is so important to Sheppey's industry, economy and local community. I hope to make it clear to my hon. Friend that I place great store by the Government's road safety strategy, which was published recently by my noble Friend Lord Whitty. I hope, as do other hon. Members and our constituents, that his vision of making the roads safer for everyone is realised.

For that reason I am leading the campaign for a roundabout at the Queenborough corner junction, in which I have the support of many constituents. I am supported also by Bob Eatwell, head of the governors of the local school, and many major businesses, which have had the courtesy to write to me. They include: Jonathan Fowler of ASW Sheerness Steel Limited; Del Monte's managing director, Mr. Peter Miller; Neil Fenn of Abbott's Laboratory in Queenborough, one of the great pharmaceutical companies in the world; David Cottam of Coolchain in Tenham–which is not in my patch but close to it; he has a huge road haulage company; and Les Harris, the managing director of Kent United Contractors Limited, on the island.

At present there is only one way across from the mainland to the island—the single-lane lifting bridge. Built in 1960, the crossing is not suitable for traffic flows today or for the needs of the economy for the 21st century. A growing population of 40,000 often doubles during summer weekends, because there are between 30,000 and 40,000 weekend caravans. Congestion is a perennial problem for my constituents, and especially for local businesses. We have acknowledged that the existing bridge cannot cope. Only last Friday, a major accident close to the bridge resulted in traffic flowing back almost three miles on either side of the bridge. Indeed, it so upset Mr. Peter Cooper, the managing director of Britannia, who was in the queue on the bridge, that he faxed me that day to ask when the bridge would be coming and whether we could have a roundabout. Little did he know that I was caught in the same queue.

The single-span lifting bridge has to go up every time a smallish yacht passes underneath. Thus the problems faced by those who use the bridge are greatly increased by the flow of traffic on the Swale itself. It has always been my contention, but I have not always won the debate, that the bridge and the new A249 link from the M2 have been built back to front. We wanted to enable Sheerness port and the people of Sheppey to connect to the mainland, but instead we built a dual carriageway from the M2 to the bridge and did not change the infrastructure on the island at all. We still have not solved the dilemma of how to gain access to the island. That is just one vexed problem in the argument of the traffic lights versus the roundabout.

However, the lack of an adequate link to the mainland only exaggerates the problems of social exclusion felt by my constituents, who refer to themselves proudly as islanders. In fact, we have the highest rate of home births in the United Kingdom. People are nervous about coming off the island. It is not that they necessarily feel that they need a passport, rather that they prefer to have their children at home. I am sure that hon. Members will agree that the term "islander" does not reflect the reality of an area so close to the heart of Europe. Sheppey should be able to share in the prosperity of the rest of south-east England, one of the top 10 areas in Europe.

Public transport on the island is unreliable and inefficient. If that is to improve, the infrastructure needs to be in place before the operators can be expected to deliver an improved service. Improved infrastructure is the carrot with which to persuade public transport operators to improve their services. That is why the bridge is important.

I am confident that, with a second crossing, we can manoeuvre our way around those obstacles; without it, I fear that those obstacles will only increase in number and size. The local economy needs a second crossing and, as I have shown, local industry rightly demands and deserves it.

Sheppey has high long-term unemployment, and some of our wards are among the poorest in the United Kingdom. However, matters are looking better. Economic prospects are much more positive and unemployment has reduced for the first time in many years. Much credit for that must go to the Government's new deal initiatives and single regeneration budget funding.

Medway port, in Sheerness, is the fifth largest port in the United Kingdom. If it is to be developed into the fourth largest, it needs the bridge. Those who visit the island say, "What a fantastic port", but we consistently lose contracts because people cannot leave the island when the bridge is raised. We need to resolve such problems, but the issue of the traffic lights versus the roundabout contributes to them.

I am pleased that we have a major port, but we also have a number of professional small businesses and leading international companies, to which I have referred. The previous Government failed to provide them with the infrastructure that they need to develop. The White Paper "A New Deal for Trunk Roads in England", published by this Government in 1998, included the second crossing in its targeted programme of improvements. But two years later, my constituents expect to know when the Labour Government will make good that provision. Businesses have had to endure uncertainty not merely for the past two years, but for the 40 years since the last bridge was built.

Without a second crossing, the Isle of Sheppey cannot prosper. It would be wonderful if, for a change, we could be a plus in the Treasury's notebook, rather than a minus. With access to a second crossing, the island's potential for economic growth could be realised, and businesses would be better able to attract further investment. That would also create new jobs, which we badly need.

In the light of my comments, I hope that the Minister and other hon. Members have no doubts about my commitment to the new crossing, which I want to see built as soon as possible. Nevertheless, having waited for decades, I want us to get the crossing right. That is the core of my argument. My constituents are entitled to a scheme that does not repeat the errors of the 1970s, but reflects the best design techniques of the 21st century. As I have said, the design of the M2 system was fundamentally wrong—it was back to front.

I turn to the proposal for the Queenborough corner roundabout. The current Highways Agency scheme for the second crossing proposes a complex junction of traffic signals at the Queenborough corner junction that will require pedestrians and cyclists to negotiate seven sets of lights. Although I welcome the fact that the Government instructed the Highways Agency to look again at proposals for the second crossing—I hope that completion of the public inquiry is a positive sign for the scheme—I am not yet convinced that the agency has put forward the best possible design for the junction at Queenborough corner. My concerns about the design are reflected in a supplementary report produced by Ove Arup and Partners, which, hon. Members will recognise, is one of the world's leading consultant engineers.

The layout of the junction proposed by the Highways Agency poses a direct threat to the future of the local service station and family pub. Those two small businesses, which each employ 20 people from Queenborough, play a significant role in our community by providing different but important services. My constituents want the new road to bring new jobs to the area. Without a roundabout, the opportunity for the pub to be developed into a hotel and conference centre will be thwarted, and we see no reason why existing jobs should be sacrificed.

In response to the threat to the service station that it owns and operates, George Hammond plc commissioned the further work by Ove Arup, which examined an alternative roundabout scheme to the Highways Agency model. George Hammond commissioned that work because it was properly motivated by concern for its business and employees. It has done a service to the local community by identifying a design that is better than that currently proposed. I am grateful to the company for that, and in particular for highlighting safety issues.

The report from Ove Arup and Partners stated that safety at Queenborough corner junction would be greatly enhanced by constructing a roundabout instead of creating a monstrous network of traffic lights. The traffic signal layout proposed by the Highways Agency will require cyclists and pedestrians to navigate seven sets of signal-controlled crossings to travel from one side of the road to the other.

I have a copy of the safety audit response to the Highways Agency's proposal, which was produced by the agency's own safety auditors. I do not want to take too much time, but it stated:

The traffic signal controlled Queenborough Junctions are considered to compromise a very severe safety hazard... Pedestrians are to be provided with complex routes requiring a number of crossings which may well prove dangerous. Cyclists are also likely to experience safety problems in crossing the wide junctions ... Complex multi phase traffic signals on high speed roads can have a poor accident record.

The key recommendation was that an alternative form of junction be adopted. In particular it is recommended that consideration be given to the use of a traffic signal controlled gyratory system.

That comes from the horse's mouth.

The Highways Agency ruled that the safety auditors' recommendation be rejected and that the view of the designers, Mott Macdonald, be accepted because

The safety auditor has taken a very subjective view that the form of junction will be inherently unsafe ... the route is not complex and the crossings are controlled ... Had there been a more suitable form it would have been adopted ... no change in the form of the junction is proposed.

There is a difference of opinion between two sets of contractors.

In its conclusion, the Highways Agency stated that the safety audit team had been slightly alarmist in its language when describing the problem, that some issues are subjective and that different engineers have different views on the acceptability of a design. The view of the Highways Agency was that its scheme, although not an ideal solution, provided a perfectly adequate design. We know all too well that when accidents happen, complacency is often the cause, and I am sure that the Chamber will agree that "adequate" is not good enough when referring to public safety, especially for our children. The Government make it clear in their road safety strategy that safety is the number one priority in transport. That is a commendable objective and many of the practical measures that they want to implement are designed to achieve that objective.

My concern is that the current layout at Queenborough corner will not meet those objectives. That is particularly important because the local school is located at the junction. Can we seriously expect young children to wait patiently to cross seven sets of traffic lights to get from home to school and the same seven sets again on the way home? I am sure that I am not alone in believing that we would all fail if we exposed children to such a risk. That is why I am campaigning for the alternative.

The Ove Arup report sensibly supports a reduction in the number of crossings because the potential for children to take risks will be reduced. Parents, staff and governors at Queenborough school all recognise the safety improvements that the roundabout would bring and have written to Lord Whitty supporting the design. I hope that the Government will listen to those people Many local businesses have also written in support of the roundabout. The Government's strategy states that there must be recognition that good engineering reduces the risk of accidents. The Ove Arup design does that and it is important that the Government consistently stand by their safety objectives.

A secondary consideration is that the Ove Arup design is £350,000 cheaper than the Highways Agency's proposal. Not only is it safer, it is cheaper and I am sure that that will not be lost on the Minister. That is due primarily to a reduced land take requirement, and I urge the Minister to think again about the scheme.

In the House next Monday evening I shall hand in a petition signed by 850 local residents urging the Government to adopt the alternative roundabout scheme. This is a serious local issue for all of us.

I should be grateful if my hon. Friend the Minster would confirm that there is nothing in principle to stop my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions from issuing a letter stating that he is minded to approve the road project in total, subject only to modifications to the proposed layout at Queenborough corner. I understand that that process need not be lengthy.

I urge my hon. Friend to do what he can to help me in my campaign for the new road, but, primarily, to ensure that the safety issues at Queenborough corner are understood. I realise that he has a quasi-judicial role and will not commit himself this morning, but he might give us a clue as to his intentions.

I hope that I have done my constituents a service by making the case for the second crossing. Percy Wells, whom I have described in the past as our best-ever Member of Parliament for the old Faversham constituency, began the campaign for a new crossing in 1945, but it is only since the election of the new Labour Government in 1997 that any progress has been made. However, we need to move on. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to do all that he can to offer my constituents something concrete to reassure them that we will get the road and that it will be the safest possible road.

In my maiden speech, I mentioned that after the 1997 general election, some mischievous islanders erected an eight-foot sign saying, "Scotland, Wales and the Isle of Sheppey: A Tory-free Zone". I would dearly love to return to this Chamber to inform my hon. Friends that islanders had erected a 10-ft sign saying, "New Labour; New Crossing; New Roundabout".

I hope that under the Freedom of Information Bill that is currently being considered in the other place, my constituents will soon have access to all the Highways Agency's work on the issue, so that we can better understand how it reaches decisions on the basis of the overall advice that it is offered.

We are moving to three-year spending reviews. The 1998 roads review said that the second crossing scheme would be spread over seven years. Will the Minister consider putting into the public domain, at the appropriate moment, not only the scheme bit by bit, but the whole scheme—that is, its approval, funding mechanism and build date?

1.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Mr. Keith Hill): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Mr. Wyatt) on his success in securing the debate. I fully appreciate that it is an important matter not only for him, but for all the people who live and work on the Isle of Sheppey.

Naturally, I listened carefully to my hon. Friend's points, especially to his arguments in favour of the second crossing and the roundabout. With regard to the latter, as he knows, the inspector's report on the local inquiry into the scheme that took place last November is before the Secretary of State awaiting a decision.

The inspector's report was received in my Department on 21 October 1999. In the normal course of events, we would have issued the decision on the scheme before now. However, post-inquiry correspondence arguing for the introduction of new evidence was received from an affected party while the inspector's report was being considered. We therefore decided, in the interests of fairness and natural justice, that the views of all interested parties should be sought before reaching a final decision on the published orders for the scheme.

On 5 April, my Department wrote to some 60 parties with a direct or indirect interest in the matter, enclosing a copy of the report. They were given until 26 April to comment. The Secretary of State is considering those comments and the conclusions and recommendations in the inspector's report. My hon. Friend will be interested to learn that the Secretary of State's decision on the scheme will be issued later this month.

The Secretary of State and his Ministers act in a quasi-judicial role when taking decisions on schemes and orders authorising trunk road proposals that have been the subject of a public inquiry. My ministerial colleagues and I must therefore be seen to be even-handed in dealing with all interested parties, scrupulously following the statutory procedural rules and having regard to the rules of fairness and natural justice, as developed by the courts. Failure to observe any of those principles carries the risk of making decisions vulnerable to legal challenge. At worst, that can result in schemes or orders authorising a road proposal being quashed by the High Court.

The period between the close of an inquiry and the announcement of a decision is especially sensitive. Ministers must avoid giving the impression that the decision might have been influenced by private representations or factors that were not put before the inquiry. My hon. Friend will appreciate that I am bound by that legal framework, and cannot discuss the merits of the scheme or any issue that the Secretary of State will need to consider in making the decision.

I am able to say, however, that on 2 April 1998 my hon. Friend made a powerful case in the House for a second Swale crossing. As he knows, the A249 Iwade bypass to Queenborough improvement scheme, which includes the proposal for a new crossing at the Swale, is in the Government's targeted programme of improvements announced in the 1998 roads review. At that time, a commitment was given that all schemes in the programme would definitely start within the next seven years, subject to satisfactory completion of the statutory procedure. The importance of the scheme to the Isle of Sheppey is fully understood. That is why its primary objective is given in the roads review as regeneration and integration.

The A249 Iwade bypass to Queenborough improvement scheme was one of the 37 schemes in the targeted programme of improvements, or TPI. A previous Transport Minister, my right hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, North and Bellshill (Dr. Reid), announced the programme on 31 July 1998, at the time of the publication of the roads review report, "A New Deal for Trunk Roads in England". In the roads review, the Department carefully scrutinised what my right hon. Friend described at the time as a "vast, unfunded 'wish list'" of 150 schemes, most of which would never have been built. They were inherited from the previous Government's programme, which had already been scaled down from more than 500 schemes, the time scale for which was never specified and for which the necessary money was never guaranteed. The schemes included in the TPI had to be robust, ready to be taken forward quickly and consistent with the five criteria that were drawn up for the new approach to appraisal, or NATA—safety, the environment, the economy, integration and accessibility.

"A New Deal for Trunk Roads in England" sets out a radical new approach, designed to deliver a road network capable of meeting the challenge of the 21st century, bringing the policy on building and operating roads into line with the Government's integrated transport White Paper, "A New Deal for Transport: Better for Everyone". There were seven schemes that were not sufficiently advanced to be considered for the TPI at the time, but which addressed serious and pressing problems, to which there were no realistic alternative solutions. Those schemes were to be taken through their preparatory stages and statutory processes so that, if they passed assessment under NATA, they could be taken forward.

On 24 March, my noble Friend Lord Macdonald of Tradeston announced how the transport fund of £280 million in the Chancellor's March Budget would be spent. He announced four more schemes—two of which were from the list of seven to which I referred earlier—to be added to the TPI. There are now 41 schemes on the TPI, although that will be reduced to 40 when the Mayor of London takes over responsibility for most of the trunk roads in Greater London on 3 July.

All 40 schemes in the TPI are important to the Government. It is a realistic, focused programme of schemes, all of which can be started in the next seven years. The schemes will help to create an integrated transport network in a manner that is environmentally sound, as safe as possible and which can help to develop the economy and promote an integrated and accessible transport network.

The Government wish the road proposals to proceed as soon as they have completed the remaining statutory procedures. However, what the Government want is not the only matter for consideration. Like the majority of road schemes and other major development proposals, the schemes must undergo a process of independent scrutiny by an inspector nominated by the Lord Chancellor and appointed by the Secretary of State. The inspector's duty in a local inquiry is to listen to all the evidence and submissions and ask questions, as necessary, in order to obtain a full understanding of all the matters raised. The inspector will submit a report, containing the salient points of the cases and a recommendation to the Secretary of State on whether the published orders for the scheme should be made. All major road schemes must pass that statutory procedure before the Secretary of State can give the go-ahead.

That is the stage that we have reached with the A249 Iwade bypass to Queenborough improvement scheme. The inspector's report on the local public inquiry held at the beginning of September is with the Secretary of State, and the inspector's conclusions and recommendation will be considered alongside the post-inquiry representations. The Secretary of State will make a decision on whether the published orders should be made, taking into account the inspector's recommendation and all the available evidence. That decision gives the go-ahead to the scheme.

I noted my hon. Friend's earlier debate, when he explained most eloquently that the Isle of Sheppey, although part of the United Kingdom, has been detached from mainland Britain for more than 1,000 years. That creates unique problems for its full-time population of 40,000 and its weekend population of almost 80,000. I appreciate that those problems are not helped by the current inadequate transport link with the mainland. As my hon. Friend has said, it prevents industry and commerce on the island from expanding and developing as easily as they would like. I acknowledge that a new crossing of the Swale would assist regeneration of the Isle of Sheppey. That is why the A249 Iwade bypass to Queenborough improvement scheme is in the TPI and has been given the primary objective of regeneration and integration in the roads review.

The scheme would also deal with the problems that are caused by the Kingsferry bridge, which has a central lifting span and carries a single-track railway. Earlier, my hon. Friend said that raising the bridge on demand for shipping on average six times a day causes long delays and congestion for vehicles. The A249 is an important link between Maidstone and Sheerness, and it shares junctions with the M20, M2 and A2. In October 1996, a 9 km stretch of the M2 to Iwade was opened.

In response to a parliamentary question in December 1998, Lord Whitty announced that, subject to the successful completion of the relevant statutory procedures, the A249 Iwade bypass to Queenborough improvement scheme was one of three major trunk road schemes in north Kent that will be taken forward under the proposed Kent design, build, finance and operate contract. Final decisions are yet to be taken on the procurement process. Such public-private partnerships remain central to our plans for modernising the way in which vital public sector projects and services of the highest quality are delivered more cost effectively.

Mr. Wyatt: On a point of clarification, does the Minister mean that we need to wait for the other two schemes to be approved before the Queenborough-Iwade development is approved, or will that project be independently funded?

Mr. Hill: I assure my hon. Friend that we do not have to wait for the other two schemes to be approved. I hope that that gives him some comfort.

The Government have revitalised the private finance initiative. Only three weeks ago, on 12 April, we awarded a £200 million design, build, finance and operate contract for managing and improving the A13, which will boost jobs and improve the environment in east London and docklands. Under that arrangement, the Government are building improved roads and purchasing miles of properly maintained and operated highways that deliver the best possible service to users. The public-private partnership encourages contractors to keep traffic lanes, footways and cycleways open, to improve facilities for public transport and goods vehicles and to minimise the disruption that is caused by utilities' work.

I appreciate my hon. Friend's desire to give a firm date for the start of work on the Iwade-Queenborough scheme. However, for the reasons that I gave, I am unable to do so while the matter is still subject to the statutory processes. I do not want to prejudice the outcome of those procedures. My hon. Friend has my assurance that, subject only to the satisfactory outcome of the outstanding statutory procedures and the need to provide a solution that offers the best value for money to the taxpayer, we are committed to providing improved accessibility between mainland Kent and the Isle of Sheppey at the earliest possible moment.

I believe that the Prime Minister will soon respond to my hon. Friend's letter of 4 April. If my hon. Friend's constituents needed it, that is yet another demonstration of his assiduous pursuit of their interests in this regard.

I am sure that my hon. Friend appreciates the legal constraints that have required me to be somewhat guarded in my response to his representations. I am grateful to him for raising this matter, which is of urgent concern to the people of the Isle of Sheppey. I congratulate them on electing to Parliament such a zealous advocate of their interests as my hon. Friend the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at two minutes to Two o'clock.

Sport

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mrs. McGuire.]

2.30 pm

The Minister for Sport (Kate Hoey): I am pleased to see so many hon. Members here on this Thursday afternoon to discuss our document "A Sporting Future for All". If I were being charitable, I would say that it was because they all cared deeply about sport and not because they wanted to avoid campaigning on the doorstep. Some of us are unable to do that today. I am delighted to have the opportunity to speak in what I hope will be an informative debate in which we can all feel free to intervene on each other and put our points of view across.

I want to take this opportunity to lay out some of the details and overall thinking behind "A Sporting Future for All", which was published on 5 April. To sum up the strategy, it attempts to give a lead in creating a more co-ordinated approach to improving sporting opportunities for all sections of the community and the country's performance in international competitions.

Those goals are inevitably connected, and we cannot differentiate between them or play one off against the other. It is worth attempting to increase participation in sport for its own sake. It is good for our health, it helps to build communities and it offers enjoyment and recreation. It also helps to increase the pool of talent from which we hope to draw our potential world and Olympic champions. Doing well in international competitions is also important in itself, as well as being wonderful for the individual athletes who participate and win. It helps sport generally, stimulates interest and involvement at the grass roots and encourages people to get involved. We all know what happens when we have done well in a football, tennis or athletics tournament. There is a lot of publicity, and our success helps to reinvigorate the sport at grass roots level.

The strategy has four main strands, and I shall deal first with what is happening in our schools, which is fundamental to the future of sport. The most important thing is that we have a clear commitment to improve sports provision in schools. It is almost too obvious to say—but it needs to be repeated—that we must get people young if we want them to develop a sporting habit and an interest in lifelong participation in sport. Over the years, all of us have been to blame for what has happened in that regard. The action that has been taken in our schools to win the interest of children—in particular, primary school children—and to get them to take part in sport has not been good enough.

I go round the country and see school after school at primary and secondary level doing wonderful things with sports and physical education. Some very good things are happening, and it is important that we do not forget that when we examine the overall situation. Evidence is emerging from our specialist sports colleges that behaviour and academic performance improve where better sports and physical education are on offer. In too many schools, however, sport has been allowed to decline. We encounter run-down facilities, pressure on school time, insufficiently trained physical education teachers, declining levels of inter-school competition, and poor overall strategic management of school sport. Schools are the bedrock of sport, and those problems cannot be allowed to continue.

As the Minister for Sport, I can make all sorts of pronouncements, and so can my Department, but unless the Department for Education and Employment is fully signed up, we shall not make the changes. Our document is special and unique, because for the first time we have produced a sports strategy that has dual ownership with the schools education sector. There is a strong commitment to the strategy from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment. The Department is committed to all aspects of the policy relating to schools and education. That is a big step forward. We can have all the aspirations in the world to change things in schools, but we need the Department for Education and Employment to work with us, so I am delighted that we have its full support. That is why I was anxious soon after I was appointed to work with my right hon. Friend the Minister for School Standards to secure the appointment of Sue Campbell of the Youth Sport Trust to act as an adviser across Departments on physical education and school sport. That has been an extremely useful appointment, because officials who at times did not talk to each other or work together now do so, up to ministerial level.

Mr. Ivor Caplin (Hove): I detected that my hon. Friend was about to leave the subject of school sport. Can she say something about the concept of school sports co-ordinators? Having been a member of the Standing Committee that considered the recent National Lottery (Amendment) Bill, which created the New Opportunities Fund, I feel that they will form an important new link between the Department for Culture, Media and Sport and the Department for Education and Employment.

Kate Hoey: My hon. Friend is right. I shall mention the school sports co-ordinators.

Underpinning "A Sporting Future for All" is the need to offer a range of high-quality sporting opportunities to school-age children within and outside the school day, and to ensure that there are pathways to help them sustain their involvement beyond school age. We have identified aspects of school sports and physical education that need attention and have provided some resources to develop solutions. Our measures include the £150 million of new Government money to match lottery grants to help improve facilities in primary schools, many of which, despite being keen to help children undertake physical education activities, do not have the physical space or adequate facilities. The money will be used for primary schools, but we shall also ensure that schools that receive money for improving facilities will be open to community use after school and in the evenings. We want schools to become the heart of their communities. This is already the case in many areas, but in too many more it has not happened, for all sorts of reasons.

We are committed to having 110 specialist sports colleges in place by 2003, and we are well on the way to meeting that target. These centres of sports excellence provide specialist teaching in addition to the usual curriculum to secure much better opportunities. Sports colleges are not intended to work in isolation. They should work with primary and secondary schools in their area and with the whole community, acting as a beacon of sporting excellence.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hove (Mr. Caplin) mentioned the announcement last year of £60 million of lottery funds for school sports co-ordinators. We are well on the way to ensuring that, from next September, co-ordinators will work with families of schools to give children more opportunities to participate in school sports activities. We announced last week the areas to which the first school sports co-ordinators will be sent. They will be based in areas with an excellence in cities initiative or in an education action or sports action zone, and in areas where there is a sports college. By September, 120 secondary schools and nearly 600 primary schools will be involved, because they will work with the families of primary and secondary school children and the sports college to help to raise the standard of physical education. It will not be a matter of putting a school sports co-ordinator into one school and then hoping that he or she will make improvements. There must be a partnership with the sports development officers in the local authority and with sports' governing bodies which may already have good development officers for cricket and rugby in the area.

"Joined up" is a dreadful phrase, but it is one that we often use, and it means that we will not act in isolation. When hon. Members see how the measures will work in their constituencies, everyone will clamour for them. We are keen for the plan to be rolled out and extended throughout the country.

We have focused, first, on communities with the greatest need, stressing the importance of sport and physical education in after-school activities. Some £160 million from the New Opportunities Fund and £80 million from the Department for Education and Employment standards fund will go to help to support out-of-school learning, which includes sport. Sport is not isolated.

School sport is crucial. I pay tribute to the role of physical education teachers who have pioneered many good initiatives over the years and at times struggled for excellence in spite of difficulties. We are working closely with the national organisations for physical education and I hope that those teachers feel that for the first time there is a policy document that recognises the importance of their role in sport.

The second strand of the strategy concerns lifelong participation. We need to ensure that young people who take up sport at school have a good experience and continue to participate when they leave. There is evidence that participation falls off in the post-school years. Links must be established and maintained with schools and other providers, such as local authorities, voluntary and commercial clubs, and professional clubs, to help people move into adult provision. We shall take steps to remove obstacles that, for one reason or another, prevent people from making the most of their abilities. Sports' governing bodies, local authorities and the funding organisations know that social inclusion must be at the heart of what they do because sport is one of the best ways of breaking down barriers in our society. It must be used to its full potential.

Sport, as we know from many studies, really can make a difference to young people, helping them to turn away from crime, truancy and drug addiction. Sport is a vehicle that can deliver so many Government policies. It is important to spend money at the right time, because it can save money in the long term.

We have a lot to be proud of in how we participate in and run sport. Anyone who knows and cares about sport gets fed up with it always being knocked, when in fact many good things are happening. More than 1.5 million people voluntarily give up their time to help young people take part in sporting activities; they get involved in evening clubs and do things just for the love of it. Self-help in sport is important.

Inequalities remain, however. More men than women participate and social class is a real issue. The rate of participation of some ethnic minority groups is still well below the national average and older people, who can benefit most from mild physical activity, participate far less than any other group.

Sports development officers are crucial to keep people involved. It is a growing phenomenon that local authorities are employing people whose job is to develop sport and work closely with others . However, we heard many times during our consultation period about the lack of good quality training for development officers. I am pleased that the National Association of Sports Development Officers has been set up and we are determined to support such groups.

We recognise the importance of a wide provision of facilities accessible to all members of the community. One of our dilemmas over the next few years is what to do about the fabric of many buildings under local authority provision. We have asked the English Sports Council to conduct an audit to show what facilities are available in which areas. Some local authorities persevered over many years of cuts and managed to protect their buildings, but in some authorities sport was the first facility to be chopped and it failed to secure further investment. The need for a massive improvement will become apparent and will have to be taken into account for implementation.

Over the next 10 years between £1.5 billion and £2 billion will be spent on community sport, particularly in areas identified in the audit as requiring more support. It is worth repeating that we would have had a different debate six years ago when not nearly so much money was available for investment in sport. People are aware that huge sums have come from the lottery. We should remember where we were six years ago and be determined to spend the money in the best way possible in pursuit of a strategy—avoiding ad hoc spending, which can depend on how good a governing body or local authority is. There must be an overall plan as to how best to spend the money in the interests of the whole country.

Playing fields are an important issue, about which many people are concerned. Despite some of the headlines and reported figures, we are delivering our manifesto commitment on playing fields. The average rate of disposal of school playing fields has dropped from 40 to three per month. If sales have been allowed to proceed, it is because they will be offset by the provision of better facilities. There will always be an argument, of course, about what constitutes better facilities. In most cases, the sales are justified if better community sports facilities and open space of some sort are available at the end of the process. We cannot say simply that nothing must ever be sold off. Even the National Playing Fields Association accepts that a diktat never to sell anything is unrealistic. We need a proper mechanism to allow proper consideration of the options and to establish whether better facilities will result at the end of the process.

As a result of our strategy, a monitoring unit will regularly examine what is happening, establish what has gone wrong and make suggestions for improvement. We also wish to establish an on-going advisory committee with the active involvement of the NPFA, which has led the way over many years in campaigning to protect playing fields and to raise awareness of the issue. If I have not always agreed with Elsa Davies, I fully commend her for her single-handed commitment to this important issue, which she has not allowed us to forget.

I wish to flag up the important role of local amateur sports clubs throughout the country. We wish them to link more effectively with schools and to establish networks to provide good junior teams, coaching and so forth to cater for every level of ability. It is important for such clubs to be open and welcoming to all. Governing bodies have a responsibility to ensure that they take the lead on that. Under the terms of Exchequer and lottery awards, they must adhere to agreed equal opportunities policies.

We are also trying to encourage governing bodies—particularly in top level professional sport—to do much more and put some of their income from the sale of broadcasting rights through to the grass roots. We will make an announcement soon about the Football Foundation and the 5 per cent. that will come from the premier league and the Football Association. Football can afford to put more money down to the grass roots, and we must ensure that it does.

Other sports have also received money. Cricket has already put substantial amounts of money down to the grass roots, and tennis is doing the same. We want to ensure that that happens at all professional clubs, because if they want the game at the top level to develop, they must ensure that they support the grass roots.

Everyone recognises the undoubted direct link between international sporting success and wider participation at home. If more people are involved at the bottom, more people will have opportunities to reach the top. However, we cannot continue to rely on that happening by chance, as has been the case for far too much of our sporting excellence, with someone seeing a talented person in the right place, picking them up, helping them, coaching them and supporting them. No clear pathway has existed to ensure that everyone has the opportunity to go from the bottom levels of competition to the top.

We want all sports bodies to adopt a more strategic approach to the delivery of sporting programmes. Governing bodies must actively encourage clubs and their coaches to work in schools and the community, as many are doing. Those bodies need to build on existing best practice. We all know from what is happening in our own areas that there is a lot of good practice and that many people are beavering away in our constituencies doing excellent work. They never seem to be thanked by anybody or receive any lottery money. No one ever seems to say, "You're doing a great job. With just a little extra money, what more could you do?"

I am determined that we should move away from the idea that everything always has to be new—new initiatives always coming along and new people coming in and telling others what to do. That is not the role of the Sports Council; it exists to set an overall strategic view and ensure that funding is accountable. We have to co-operate with those who are already doing the work, often with no reward.

The third strand is talent development. Talented players do not emerge automatically. If people are to progress, they must receive the right coaching and support at every stage. Obviously, schools and clubs are the first step. We are asking everybody in sport to pay particular attention to ensuring that they have talent development systems that pick up and nurture able competitors.

Many of our competitor countries have systems that are very different from ours. Many are based on a much stronger local club structure. In France, very little goes on in schools and all the sport happens in clubs. I do not think that we can adopt that system, and I would not want to, because our schools do an extremely good job. They have done things differently, but I think that we can help our clubs to develop. Clubs should be at the centre of a network of feeder clubs. That is already happening in swimming. In Leeds, the Amateur Swimming Association has organised a sophisticated swimming club system that ensures that young swimmers have a clear way of moving forward and are not isolated from the beginning.

Rugby union has done great work on feeder clubs, offering opportunities for youngsters to get involved for the first time and giving them a clear idea of where they should go next. We need to encourage more of our governing bodies and sports to develop the idea of hub and satellite clubs, and we will work closely with governing bodies and local authorities to develop a comprehensive system of satellite clubs.

The fourth and final strand to the strategy is improvement of the support that we give to our top-performing athletes. The UK Sports Institute and world-class programmes will make a huge difference. Already, the support that can be given to our top athletes has changed, and we hope that we will see some effects of that at the Olympics, although these things take time. A development and support system does not appear overnight, and it may not happen in time for this year's Olympics, although I hope that we will make improvements on Atlanta.

Because of its nationwide network of high performance facilities and support services, the UK Sports Institute will have a major impact on the development of excellence in this country among both those already achieving success at the highest sporting levels and those aspiring to follow in the footsteps of their idols. The UKSI will provide our top performers with access to the highest quality sports science, sports medicine, coaching and athlete education and career programmes.

In England, plans for seven of the 10 regions were announced last October, and up to £120 million of lottery funds will be invested between now and 2001 in the English Institute of Sport. Good progress is under way in Bath, Loughborough and Manchester, and detailed designs are in preparation with the aim of starting work this autumn, if not before. Good progress is also being made in the network centres developed in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland.

We are meeting all the UK sports councils to find out how to ensure that the services and the buildings are delivered as quickly as possible, in accordance with all the normal accountability criteria. If we do not move quickly, we could miss out. For whatever reasons, the process has already taken too long. Everybody accepts that. There is no point going back and blaming anybody or anything. Although we have taken far too long to reach our current position, we will now begin to see a real change. Each institute must apply to the lottery for bits of the overall cake, and I am considering ways of ensuring that the mechanisms for such applications are made as easy as possible, taking the normal accountability procedures into account. We do not want another layer of bureaucracy, and I am afraid that, at the moment, the process is full of bureaucracy that does not improve accountability or serve any purpose. It needs to be examined and changed, and I am pleased that the English Sports Council and the sports councils are keen to tackle that.

The UKSI is more than just bricks and mortar. We must make every endeavour to establish support services as soon as possible, even if the facilities are not in place. The athlete career and education programme, known as ACE, is up and running, and providing selected athletes with personal development courses to meet individual needs in financial planning, media training and nutritional advice. Thirty accredited facilitators have been appointed, and about 250 athletes from more than 20 sports have undergone a personal assessment. A high-performance coaching programme has also been introduced to provide sport and coach-specific personalised programmes ranging from information technology skills to specific training sessions.

Other support programmes are being developed to provide access to sports technology and expertise, data information systems and analysis, sports medicine and sports science, and medical insurance. We are a long way from the days when I was involved in sport. Now, athletes need to be very good not only at what they do, but at understanding the jargon and how to use systems to perform better.

We expect everything to be fully operational by summer 2002, and I am pleased that we have set that deadline. To deliver the aspirations of individual sports and athletes, all the parties must have a common aim and the will to work closely together to ensure that decisions are reached speedily, efficiently and effectively and are geared to the athletes and the coaches, not the organisations. We have talked about the UKSI concept for so long that we are now ready for action.

In striving for sporting excellence and progress we must also ensure that we create the right environment for all competitors to achieve success on their own merits and hard work. Everyone who cares about sport knows that drug abuse in sport is just plain cheating. We are strongly committed to measures to eliminate such abuse. We spend over £1 million a year on ensuring the quality of the UK's drug testing programme, and this country was the first worldwide to achieve ISO 9002 accreditation for its testing system. We have also been working closely with our international partners in the fight against drug misuse in sport, and we played an important role in the establishment of the World Anti-Doping Agency last November.

The recent spate of positive tests, especially for the banned steroid nandrolone, has called into question our commitment to stamping out drug misuse in this country and dealing with the culprits effectively. That must be seen in the context of the more than 5,000 tests carried out in the UK, 1.5 per cent. of which produced a reported finding and not all of those proved to be positive. However, we must not be complacent. While this taint of drugs remains, it is bad for the development of sport, particularly for youngsters.

Mr. Caplin: I thank my hon. Friend for giving way. The concern is about how the international athletics community deals with the whole issue of nandrolone. A number of cases are outstanding and the Olympic games are coming up. Some of the athletes who have been caught with nandrolone, rightly or wrongly, could be competing in Sydney. Has she had an opportunity not only to consider that, but to tell our international partners that we need to deal with the issue of nandrolone as a matter of urgency?

Kate Hoey: My hon. Friend is right that nandrolone is causing huge concern at the moment. UK Athletics, more than any other body, is concerned about the situation. There is a problem, and I do not think that the governing body of the sport should be involved at all levels with testing, with decisions about guilt and with the setting of penalties. We must find a way of making that process independent from the governing body of the sport. There is a logical reason for that: as everyone knows, the British Athletics Federation went bankrupt over the Diane Modahl case. Clearly, sport itself must contribute something to the establishment of an independent process, but the Government may also have to find ways of ensuring that we have an independent system—not for testing, as we already have that, but for dealing with athletes after they have been tested. I am working closely with Dave Moorcroft on that problem, as UK Athletics is very concerned about it. It affects the whole of sport.

The organisers in Sydney are particularly keen that it should be a drug-free Olympics and are doing all that they can. The problem, if we are honest, is that individuals will always find ways of getting round the system. The more that technology and science find ways to test, the more people will try to get round them. For those of us who have been around in sport for a long time, that is one of the unhappiest aspects of the way that sport is going. It is so depressing for everyone involved. I remain determined to ensure that the UK's systems and procedures, while retaining the respect of competitors, continue to have the support of the public, who must be sure that the results are genuine and fair.

In implementing "A Sporting Future for All", I am conscious that we are asking a great deal of many people involved in sport. That is right, because Governments do not run sport. We cannot—indeed, we would not want to—decide who goes to the Olympic games or determine the best way to develop a particular sport. We must always remember that sports have experts. Nevertheless, the Government must develop strategies, set minimum standards and assume an overall leadership role in sport.

We have placed a lot of emphasis on the importance of our governing bodies for sport. In return for their commitment to delivering greater participation, better talent development and the best support for our top competitors, they will have greater financial autonomy. That is what governing bodies want, especially those that can handle large amounts of money and satisfy us that they can honour all the commitments for which we have asked. Once governing bodies can show that they manage and plan robustly and that their management systems operate satisfactorily, they will receive more control over the funding that their sport receives. We are empowering the key stakeholders in sport to ensure its long-term, sustainable development. The theme of sustainability runs through the document. Although the word is not mentioned, it is key to it. We do not want one-day wonders of instant, knee-jerk success—although that is usually nice, because it produces good headlines. We want measures that will last and will genuinely make a difference. Part of the document's importance is that it will be judged not next year or even in three years' time, but in 10 years' time on how much it has genuinely made a difference.

We shall ensure that the document does not simply sit on a shelf like so many other documents that successive parties have produced. We have created a strategy implementation group, the first meeting of which will be on 24 May. The people invited to serve on that group have been invited as individuals rather than as representatives of a particular group or organisation. Their backgrounds draw on all spheres of sporting life and achievement. Collectively, the group's experience will form a great spectrum of sporting knowledge and practice, focusing particularly on education in the community and excellence. The group will propose the measures necessary to make the strategy work, and in the autumn, we shall make further announcements. It is a genuine opportunity for follow-through. We are not merely using warm words. It is easy to use warm words about sport—as, indeed, Governments do—but, as I continually remind my colleagues, we must provide the resources and cross-departmental support that sport is beginning to receive.

We are pleased with the welcome that the document has received from all sections of the country. It is a document that people sit down and read, as it will relate to their aspect of their particular sport or expertise. I thank all the people who contributed to it. I am especially enthused when I travel around the country to discover the passion that people have for sport. We have achieved a great deal, and absolutely nothing can be blamed on individuals. We must put all available resources into harnessing all current developments and ensure that they form part of a partnership with a clear strategy for the way forward. The Government's role in that is to lead key players in delivering sporting opportunity and excellence. We shall work in partnership with schools and other education institutions, local government, sports councils and national governing bodies for sport.

There is much to look forward to. With the help of world-class events funding, we have done well to bring major sporting events to our country. We relish the thought of the indoor and outdoor world athletics championships. The Commonwealth games come to Manchester in 2002, and the rugby league world cup will be staged in the autumn. Last year, we held the cricket and rugby union world cups.

We look forward to receiving soon a report of the British Olympic Association's preparation, discussions and thinking on the feasibility of hosting the Olympic games. It is not possible merely to wake up in the morning and decide to host them; it is a huge undertaking, and there is no point in our ever thinking of trying to do so unless everyone gives the attempt total support. That support would have to go beyond mere words.

I send my best wishes to all our athletes going to Sydney. The BOA is an extremely professionally run organisation, which has done a terrific job to ensure that we have a sophisticated, highly trained and organised group going there. The camp that it has set up on the west coast has given many of our young athletes the opportunity of warm-weather training. We hope to be successful in the Olympic games but, whatever the outcome, it will be an opportunity to sell sport to our young people.

I have given a comprehensive report about the document; I appreciate that it has been slightly long. I look forward to hearing hon. Members' responses, and hope that we can work together across party to ensure that sport in our country thrives and that everyone has the opportunity to participate.

3.11 pm

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): How often have we heard leading players say how fortunate they are to earn their living playing sport and doing what they enjoy best? Notwithstanding other attractions today, we are fortunate to have the opportunity to do what many of us most enjoy doing, which is talking about sport. I see that some hon. Members with whom I have enjoyed talking about sport over the years are present.

I mean no disrespect, but I would have preferred an annual debate about sport to be held on the Floor of the House. Also, we should have avoided holding our debate on an election day. I see some nods of agreement; I apportion no blame to anyone present.

We take a steer from the shadow Culture Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for East Surrey (Mr. Ainsworth), and the Prime Minister. Both began forewords to recently published documents with the words "Sport matters". We can all agree with that. Sport is vital to the physical health of the nation. It is a huge, multi-billion pound industry. At its best, sport is exciting, passionate and hugely enjoyable. It can help to improve our quality of life. As the Minister said, the massive and invaluable contribution made to sport by volunteers is testament to its huge popularity.

Mr. Caplin: The hon. Gentleman has confused me. I can clearly see the foreword by the Prime Minister that starts with the words "Sport matters", but he mentioned another document with a foreword by an inconsequential Conservative Front Bencher. Is it in the Library for hon. Members to see?

Mr. Greenway: On 31 January, more than two months before the Government published their document, the Conservative party published a blue paper. It was circulated to every sporting body in the country. Its objectives were greatly acclaimed and many of its ideas—surprise, surprise—turned up in the Government's document. I did not intend to be quite so partisan, but the hon. Gentleman has goaded me into it.

Sport is important for many reasons. It has health-related benefits. It teaches people to win and lose with equanimity. It can improve cognitive skills such as literacy and numeracy; anyone watching the final couple of frames of the world snooker championships would almost need a calculator to work out, from the points left on the table, who was about to win. It can also help reduce the level of crime by channelling aggression and can play an important role in dismantling social and ethnic barriers. It can help to protect and enhance environments and play a part in stimulating the economic regeneration of local communities. Local sport and leisure facilities are an important source of employment and can provide a healthy social focal point for the community. Only yesterday, I received a briefing note that stated that 14 per cent. of adults work out in a gym—speaking of which, the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) is the honorary president of the Fitness Industry Assocation. For all those reasons, sport matters.

In our aspirations for sport and the importance that we accord it, there is considerable common ground between the Government and the Opposition. The Minister and I do not just share a keen interest in the fortunes of Arsenal football club; we also have a shared interest in the future of sport at every level. Nevertheless, politics being what it is, there are clear differences of view between us, some of which I shall detail later. The Minister said that we have much to be proud of. I agree. We are glad that much of what the Government are doing and plan to do takes forward the Conservative Government's policy initiatives, particularly those of my right hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major). I have consulted sporting bodies around the country over the past three months and have found high regard for what my right hon. Friend did. He took a personal interest in sport and his achievements included the publication of the White Paper on sport, "Raising the Game", the creation of the Sports Council and the implementation of important projects such as the UK Sports Institute and a national network of centres of sporting excellence to coach and nurture potential world champion sports men and women.

The Minister referred to Bath university, which I recently visited, as she had a short time earlier. Anyone interested in seeing a centre of excellence based at one of our regional universities should visit Bath university and witness best practice in operation. Jed Roddy, whose concept the whole project was, has achieved tremendous things and set a target of five medals at the Sydney Olympics for his team. We wish them all every success.

Although we are pleased with the Government's commitment to continuing our policy of establishing a UK Sports Institute—I very much welcome what the Minister said this afternoon—and the fact that the institute should be fully operational by 2002, I have to tease her a little by telling her that people in Yorkshire are not best pleased with the Government's U-turn on their original promise to site the institute in Sheffield.

Mr. Andrew Reed (Loughborough): While the hon. Gentleman is making a regional tour of Britain, will he acknowledge the great contribution of Loughborough to the UK Sports Institute? The people in Loughborough are grateful that Sheffield was not chosen as the headquarters. More importantly, the original concept that we inherited in 1997 was of a single hub. Will the hon. Gentleman also acknowledge that regional centres are much more important?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody): Order. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman understands that interventions must be brief.

Mr. Greenway: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for mentioning Loughborough, because it was there that the Conservative party held an extremely successful "Listening to Britain" meeting, which informed our new policy. One cannot name all the relevant places, but the hon. Gentleman is right in saying that what is happening in Loughborough is as commendable as what is happening in Bath. I hope to pay the people in Loughborough a visit soon; it is convenient, because I can call in on the way down from Yorkshire.

There is no doubt that policy initiatives develop as they go along. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that there must be regional centres, and the number and siting of them is something that the UKSI has been working on. The Secretary of State should be a little careful, however; he eulogised over the choice of Sheffield and then, a year or two later, said that things had gone completely wrong there. It is not the first time that he has done something like that. People are given encouragement and then their hopes are dashed. I stress the point that people in Sheffield are extremely disappointed by that change of view.

We are pleased that the Government have acknowledged in their document the importance of the national lottery, which has proved an invaluable resource for sport. Some time next week, Sport England will reach the total of £1 billion of support given to sporting centres. That money has supported 3,000 projects, and we should congratulate Sport England on that tremendous achievement. I was grateful to the Minister for her acknowledgement that the lottery has transformed the landscape of sporting provision.

Vital though the lottery has been, however, we should not overlook the important contributions made by other funding arrangements such as the sports match scheme, which was started in 1992. Its contribution of more than £3 million a year is now subsumed in Sport England's grant and aid. The Foundation for Sport and the Arts was particularly important before the lottery was established. The Football Trust, in common with that foundation, relied heavily on Treasury support through rebates of betting tax and on support from the pools. I know from my work on the all-party football group that there was huge cross-party support for those rebates.

Like the Minister, we look forward to the launch of the Football Foundation, which will give people at the top of the football pile—especially the very rich premier league—the opportunity to invest directly in the grass roots of sport through the 5 per cent. contribution. I hope that football will not be the only beneficiary, because many of the facilities can be used by other sports. Together with significant help from business and broadcasters through sponsorship, that new money has transformed the United Kingdom's sporting infrastructure, to the benefit of spectators and participants of all levels of ability.

It is impossible to see how the Government's objectives could be realised without the support of the lottery. The Minister has acknowledged the extent to which lottery funding will be the mainstay of the Government's programme. However, we should ask whether the resource of the lottery fund will prove sufficient to match the spending priorities that the Government have set out as well as all the other commitments that it has to meet. The Government have not acknowledged in their sports strategy that sport now gets a smaller slice of the lottery cake than before; the creation of the new opportunities fund has resulted in a significant reduction in its share. The lottery has been raided to pay for health, education and environment projects. I remind the Minister that, when in opposition, the Labour party said that such things should always be paid for out of core Treasury expenditure. In effect, the sports lottery fund will be reduced by £50 million of current lottery ticket sales. The Central Council of Physical Recreation has called for sport's original one fifth of lottery funding to be reinstated at the end of this year, when the millennium fund expires. The Government have chosen to divert millennium fund receipts to the new opportunities fund. As a result, the new opportunities fund will attract one third of all lottery receipts. The Government have obviously made up their mind. The key issue is the use of that one third, and the extent to which the arm's length principle will be maintained.

Mr. Caplin: As I said to my hon. Friend the Minister, the new opportunities fund can be used in relation to projects such as school sports co-ordinators. One cannot pigeonhole each of the categories of the lottery, which extend across government. Perhaps the Tories should get used to that.

Mr. Greenway: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's intervention. On the issue of school sports co-ordinators, the blue paper responses suggest that they should be PE teachers.

Kate Hoey: Yes, they will be.

Mr. Greenway: I am told that they will be. It is no disrespect to the hon. Member for Hove (Mr. Caplin), as he was not then a Member of Parliament, but I can remember the debates when the lottery was established, and the idea that lottery money should be used to fund the salaries of teachers was totally alien to Labour Members at the time. If NOF is to be used in ways that enhance and improve sport facilities, that is all to the good. If we are to retain an arm's length principle, however, to what extent can Ministers guarantee that NOF will always deliver, and that it will not use the money in other ways? The same degree of control cannot be exercised over NOF as over the Department's budget.

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas (Harrow, West): The hon. Gentleman has so far mentioned every funding stream available to sport apart from central Government expenditure. Is that because of embarrassment? In the last two years of the previous Conservative Government, the budget for sport declined by 6.7 per cent. and 6.5 per cent.

Mr. Greenway: The hon. Gentleman has a cheek to introduce an argument about funding. It has just been pointed out that in the last three or four years of the previous Conservative Government, who introduced the lottery, sport was made one of the main beneficiaries. You may recall, Madam Deputy Speaker, that originally, there were to be only four good causes, and sport was to receive a quarter of the money. Under the Labour Government, it is receiving a sixth. The Conservative party, especially on the basis of recent years, should not have to take any lessons from the Labour party in terms of its commitment to funding sport. Sport England's budget is in excess of £40 million a year—

Mr. Thomas: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Greenway: No. We have a great deal to discuss. If the hon. Gentleman wants to have a row about resources, I suggest that he reads the Government's document, which acknowledges that £1 billion of lottery money has been made available to fund 3,000 projects.

The Minister has told us that the Government's strategy will provide £150 million for 300 centres in primary schools. I am not saying that such initiatives are not worthwhile; they are, and we support them. However, those hon. Members who are getting excited about sport funding must acknowledge, as the Minister has, that the lottery has effected a transformation. We are debating the extent to which lottery money can be used to support new initiatives in schools and sports clubs throughout the country, to give every child a sporting chance. That is what the strategy is supposed to be about.

The document says that NOF has already committed £125 million to its green spaces initiative—among other things, for playing fields. However, despite wanting to take decisions at arm's length, NOF's consultative paper, published last September, stated that purchasing land was not a priority. That must be cleared up.

The Government say that the space for sport and the arts initiative will provide up to £150 million—£75 million each from the Exchequer and the lottery—to primary schools to provide new multi-purpose sport and arts facilities for children in the wider community. Will the Minister explain how that initiative is to work? How will it be paid for? From which lottery source will the £75 million be drawn? The Government say that Sport England is said to have agreed to ring-fence 20 per cent. of lottery funds for youth sport, the bulk of which is to be spent in schools. Is that 20 per cent. the £75 million, or is it a separate amount? The sports lottery fund receives £250 million a year, and 20 per cent. of that is only £50 million.

The document commits NOF to providing £160 million to support out-of-school-hours learning, with special emphasis on sport and physical education. That is on top of the £125 million for open spaces. I know that that money probably covers more than one year, but collectively it is more than NOF receives now. Will the Minister explain, if necessary in writing, how those sums add up and whether the funding bodies have signalled their agreement? More important, what assessment has been made of how Sport England and NOF are to respond to other funding requests? I do not suggest that the money is being targeted at anything other than worthy causes, but we are concerned that the sums should add up and that expectations are not raised that cannot be fulfilled.

The Minister mentioned the need to reinvest in fabric. I agree with her that a great many sporting facilities, particularly those run by local authorities, are in desperate need of refurbishment, but lottery funding has never been made available. All those factors add to the demands made on the lottery.

We have considerable sympathy with the need to streamline the structure of sport governance and to improve accountability. The document refers to the possibility of sports bodies being made more accountable to lottery players. Will decisions for lottery spending be delegated to sport governing bodies and away from Sport England? If so, those governing bodies will have the difficult responsibility of declining entirely worthy applications, because so much of the sports lottery fund will be pre-committed.

We must also bear in mind the fact that the sports lottery fund will have to meet its commitment on the cost of the Commonwealth games in Manchester, and will probably have to make a contribution to the costs of the proposed new stadium at Pickett's Lock for the world athletics championships.

I repeat that our generous support for investments in facilities in schools and local clubs will provide sporting opportunities for young people. A new sports pavilion was recently opened at Malton in my constituency. That initiative was instigated by the Fitzwilliam sports association. The proposal was twice turned down, but we kept at it and on the third occasion we received the money. It is a £200,000 sports lottery fund project. Boys and girls will now be sure of the best facilities when they play cricket, hockey and soccer. The pavilion is next to the rugby union ground, which has also been the target of a big sports lottery project. Youngsters of all levels and ages can play in the teams, which are often their only opportunity to engage in competitive team sport, as so many of them go to schools with few pupils.

We believe that all of that is important, and we greatly welcome the Government's acknowledgment that the level of provision of sport in schools is unacceptable. I apportion no blame to the Minister. However, the position has unquestionably deteriorated during the past three years. The curriculum has become too prescriptive, the effects of which have been confirmed by Sport England and in a number of surveys, including the Adidas report. Last August, the sport and physical education network, which is based at Leeds Metropolitan university, published a survey showing that more than half a million hours of physical education had been lost in primary schools alone in the previous six years. The survey showed that the decline had featured especially in the three or four years prior to its publication, as cuts had been made to make time for literacy and numeracy work.

That approach must change and I entirely endorse the Minister's remarks in that respect. What schools do should be rather less prescribed. If they had greater freedom in the management of pupil time, there would be a significant increase in the amount of sport played within and between them. We agree with the Minister that school sports co-ordinators have a role to play in achieving that. I am looking forward to seeing what can be achieved, especially in a huge rural area that has many small primary schools but not enough kids of the right age group for one even to think of forming teams that can play inter-school soccer or cricket. The target of 600 co-ordinators is ambitious, but we share that objective.

We note the Government's commitment to the creation of 110 specialist sports colleges by 2003. That was initially another Conservative policy initiative and it is not without controversy. We want more specialist schools, and not just for sport, although sports schools are especially important. We believe that that is a good idea, but that schools and colleges should themselves determine whether to specialise and the manner in which they should do so. More important, the existence of specialist sports colleges must not be used as an excuse for neglecting sport in mainstream schools. It is a cause for concern that the strategy document is very brief on mainstream secondary schools. For that reason, we are concerned that the title "A Sporting Future for All" conveys an aspiration that may not be matched for every child.

Mr. Reed: Does the hon Gentleman accept that the use of school sports co-ordinators and specialist sports colleges achieves the aims about which he is speaking? Burleigh college, in my constituency, has shown that the two go together.

Mr. Greenway: I thought that I had encouraged the thought that the aims can be achieved in such a manner. I am merely saying that the strategy document places huge emphasis on primary schools. It is right to do so, in many respects. I think that it was Trevor Brooking who, when Sport England published its recent survey on the decline in physical education and sport in schools, commented on how important it was to focus properly on the five to eight-year-olds, as that is the age range when one can achieve most with a child. I agree with all that, but I am concerned that there is still a gap in provision in the secondary school sector. There has been rather too much emphasis against competitive team games for the 14 to 16-year-old age group, although one understands the reasons why.

The Minister mentioned the vexed issue of the sale of school playing fields. From my personal experience as a county councillor and a school governor, I know that school land can sometimes be sold without damaging sports provision. A few years ago, in one school in my constituency, land sales paid for significant capital expenditure on school buildings without detriment to sporting provision. However, there is no doubt from the communications received by hon. Members that many sporting bodies remain concerned that school playing fields and sports pitches continue to be sold. I listened to the Minister's remarks on the subject, and appreciate that she has acknowledged in Culture, Media and Sport questions in the House that such sales have continued. One cannot say that the policy is being delivered and acknowledge that sales are continuing because the policy was to stop all sales.

Kate Hoey: The policy is very clear: it is to stop the compulsory sale of playing fields, which is very different, as the hon. Gentleman would recognise if he is fair.

Mr. Greenway: I note the Minister's clarification. I am about to be extremely fair because I want to make two important points that were set out in our blue paper and also included in the Government's strategy.

We called for an audit of all playing fields and sports facilities in order to create a national database. I am astounded that that has not been done before. It is completely illogical to try to determine what is required in various parts of the country without knowing what already exists. I subscribe to the theory that more affluent areas have been able to get sports lottery projects up and running, whereas more run-down and deprived areas, which do not have the business acumen or the support from local communities, have been unable to provide matching funding. We desperately need a database. Only then can we have any idea whether the sale of land will damage sporting provision. We also called for planning policy guidance to be strengthened—another proposal in the strategy. I am sure that all hon. Members would agree that more work needs to be done.

While highlighting areas of agreement, I want to mention two other important issues, neither of which was touched on by the Minister, but on which we have made recommendations that were also mentioned in the document. The first is the need for a cross-departmental forum for sport. The Minister said that it was important for the Department for Education and Employment and the Department for Culture, Media and Sport to work together. However, the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions also has an extremely important role to play. We must have more joined-up government, not just between Departments but between national and local government, if we are to have the desired impact.

The other area of agreement is the hope to improve sporting opportunities for ethnic minorities and to tackle exclusion in all respects. That is also mentioned in the strategy document.

I want to mention one or two issues on which we believe the Government should have said more. The first relates to voluntary clubs. The Minister paid tribute more than once to the work of volunteers. Certainly, in the three months or so since I have had this job, I have been impressed by the scale of voluntary action, without which a great deal of sporting opportunity would not exist. However, several issues relating to finance require some fresh thinking, and I have no doubt that we in the Conservative party and the Minister will have to argue with the shadow Treasury team and Treasury Ministers to get some sense across.

Many clubs are not registered charities. As a consequence, they lose out on VAT exemption and discretionary rate relief. I received a delegation to my surgery from the York district sports council, which emphasised the considerable concerns of several long-established sports clubs in the York area that originally benefited from the financial support of a major employer, such as Rowntree, the railways and the civil service, which no longer provide that support. They are now facing substantial rates bills because of the revaluation of their facilities. Many of those revaluations result from improvements that were funded by the lottery. I have agreed to investigate the matter in the York area, and I am sure that the Minister will be pleased to receive a report of my findings. In congratulating ourselves on funding capital projects, we must also be aware of revenue implications. Discretionary rate relief is often the only revenue support that many clubs receive from their local authority.

The document mentions the need to attract national and international events to the UK. I hope that people will realise that my comments on Wembley stadium and the plans for Pickett's Lock are intended to be constructive and positive. It saddens me that the Wembley stadium project has become the subject of ridicule. A story on it appears in the national press every week. I was astounded by the Minister's written replies to me this week. She confirmed that Ministers have known for two years that Brent council would insist on £30 million capital infrastructure investment, and that those matters have been discussed in the Wembley task force that was established by the Culture Secretary and which has departmental representation. The Minister, however, confirmed that there has been no cross-departmental discussion at ministerial level.

I raised my concerns from the Back Benches during Culture, Media and Sport questions before I became the shadow Minister for Sport. I was told that I would be unnecessarily alarmist if I suggested that Wembley might not get the go-ahead or be ready for planned events. Sadly, that is how the situation is starting to look. Only last July, the Secretary of State said that Wembley would be the centrepiece of the Government's campaign to attract the world's premier sporting events to this country, and that he and the Prime Minister had taken every opportunity to associate themselves with England's world cup bid. I applaud them for that, but it is reasonable to expect them to intervene and, as Ken Bates said to me a week or two ago, to bang some heads together to resolve the infrastructure issues.

I am sorry that the hon. Member for Hove has left the Chamber because he was part of a delegation that recently met the leader of Brent council, Paul Daisley, and its chief environmental officer. They were entirely happy with the design of the stadium. There was nothing wrong with it. We are all in favour of England's world cup bid, and I have been grateful for the Culture Secretary's comments at recent events on my support for it. However, the bid would be greatly assisted if consent were granted, even if it were subject to a condition on infrastructure. Having won the right to stage the 2006 world cup, there would not be a huge problem in persuading the private sector to invest in the Wembley area through partnership schemes. That would help to ensure that Brent council puts in place what is necessary for the local community. I hope that anyone who reads our debate would agree that common sense should prevail, even at this late hour. It would be catastrophic if the project were turned down and there was a year or more of appeal and argument.

Wembley has also been something of a shambles in relation to athletics. Last July, the Secretary of State endorsed the new stadium as a suitable venue for international athletics. However, in December he told the House that he was concerned about the viability of the proposed solution. The speed with which the Labour-dominated Select Committee criticised the Minister's decision only served to highlight the mismanagement. The design for Wembley remains unaltered and it will be capable of hosting athletics should the need arise. As the Minister hinted, the Culture Secretary has endorsed the Pickett's Lock site at Enfield as the preferred venue for the world athletics championship. I note from written answers that the Secretary of State's commitment to the International Amateur Athletics Federation is simply for London to provide a suitable venue.

I was at Pickett's Lock on the morning on which the IAAF decision was made in Paris. I can understand why Sport England and the Lea Valley regional park authority offered Pickett's Lock as a suitable venue. However, no one should be under any illusion—a formidable programme of work must be achieved if the 2005 championships are to take place on the site. There is an existing sports centre with an indoor bowling club for the elderly—5,000 people play there regularly. There is no provision for them to go anywhere else. Improvements to transport infrastructure are possible. A railway station right outside the front door and a motorway link can be built. However, we all know how long such projects take to plan and to bring to fruition. We need an accommodation block for at least 3,000 athletes. There are no plans or costings and, we would argue, no money.

Another important question is whether Pickett's Lock would be suitable as a venue at which London could host the Olympic games, perhaps in 2012. Like the Minister, we are looking forward to considering the British Olympic Association's feasibility study later in the year. I would like the Minister to tell us what the Government's response would be if the BOA found against Pickett's Lock. A problem that I can envisage concerns accommodation. I understand that one would need up to 10 times the number of beds for an Olympic games as for a world athletics championship.

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: My constituents have already identified an excellent spot for the accommodation venue. It is currently RAF Northolt, which generates 13,000 flights, all of which are very irritating to them. The site would be much better used for housing.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Before we have too many publicity advances, the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) might continue.

Mr. Greenway: Middlesex university would be interested in building accommodation for about 3,000 people at a site at Pickett's Lock about a mile from the existing sports stadium. That would be enough for the world athletics championships but nowhere near enough for an Olympic games.

For the avoidance of doubt, I confirm for the Minister that, on the day on which I visited Pickett's Lock, I issued a press statement endorsing the selection of the site. I emphasised the challenging programme of work needed to accomplish the promise made. The more one examines the issues, the more challenging that programme becomes. What has happened concerning Wembley does not inspire confidence, not only in we politicians but in others outside Parliament, especially in the media, who are only too keen to take advantage if things start to go awry.

Whether in bidding for the football world cup in 2006, the world athletics championships and the Olympic games or ensuring the success of the Commonwealth games in Manchester in two years' time, the Conservative party will give the Government and the sports bodies concerned every possible support. However I hope that the Minister will take the comment in the spirit in which it is offered we have a duty as the official Opposition to ask the questions that must be addressed to ensure that the Government play their full part in fulfilling the aspiration that they have so readily endorsed.

On the whole, the document is welcome, not least because it acknowledges the parlous state of sport in schools and the need to reverse the decline in participation by young people in competitive team sports. It might be argued that three years was a long time to wait for the Government's first major policy initiative on sport. My greatest criticism is that, during those three years, the Government's education policies have undermined sports provision through an over-prescriptive curriculum. We shall reverse the decline in school sports only when that over-prescriptive approach is abandoned. Further, the decline will be reversed only when every child, and not only those thought to be gifted, is allowed the chance to take part in a range of sports with sufficient frequency and encouragement. In that way, their talents might develop, if only to allow them to see sport as an important part of their future life. In that respect, I share the Minister's aspiration.

3.54 pm

Mr. Bob Russell (Colchester): To continue the final few comments of the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) and to maintain the united sport front, the Liberal Democrats broadly welcome "A Sporting Future for All". To emphasise the point, I say that sport really matters.

The Government deserve a gold medal for all their hype on the issue. However, the reality is that our young children—at least 75 per cent. of them, according to the Government—are being cheated when it comes to sport and physical recreation in schools. We welcome the general thrust and the strategy set out in "A Sporting Future for All", provided this is the first, and not the only, step. The promises will become just another broken pledge if there is not rapid progress toward implementation with further boosts to sport to follow.

Young people today are less fit than their parents, grandparents and great-grandparents were. A study for Sport England, published earlier this year, confirmed that a generation of unfit children is emerging from our schools following the decline in PE lessons, which is the result of the drive to raise standards in literacy and mathematics. Worse, millions of youngsters spend far more time watching television or playing computer games than taking part in any form of exercise. A medical time bomb is ticking away under the nation.

Sport England's chairman, Trevor Brooking—the much respected former England footballer—has been quoted as saying that children leaving school now are > technically the worst generation I have ever seen.

He added:

> The fundamental problem is that children are not being taught the basic techniques of how to hold a bat or racquet, or how to kick a ball.

Sport is not encouraged in schools; it is discouraged. The overemphasis on academic achievement at all costs—placing less importance on everything else, so that pupils can, it is hoped, achieve slightly higher pass marks, thus improving their school's place in the league tables for examination results—is damaging our young people. Their present and long-term health, their fulfilment in many other spheres and their quality of life are being harmed. Involvement in the uniformed movements and other youth groups and participation in the full range of the arts and sports are harmed by the unhealthy obsession with academic studies. The message going out to young people is that those who are less academically gifted are of less worth to society. That attitude must be changed. Life is made up of more than the classroom and spending long hours studying at home.

Schools are failing in the basic requirement—a Government target—that pupils should participate in a minimum of two hours of physical education a week. In a parliamentary answer on 7 March in column 576W, it was admitted that the two-hour minimum is not being achieved in three of four age groups and was only just achieved in the fourth age group. Those figures were based on inspections by the Office for Standards in Education in 1998. We fear that the situation has worsened rather than improved since then. At key stage 1—pupils aged five to seven—the average time spent on physical education was 1 hour 20 minutes a week. At key stage 2—ages seven to 11—it was 1 hour 35 minutes. At key stage 3—ages 11 to 14—the minimum two hours was achieved. At key stage 4—ages 14 to 16—it had fallen to just 1 hour 15 minutes. Those figures confirm my observation that the Government's education policies are forcing schools to relegate sport and recreation from the timetable. Would the Minister like to guess how many sports teachers will be awarded performance-related pay?

This Government, like previous Governments, do not rate sport highly. They seek to bask in the glory of sporting triumphs when they occur, but the reality is that, as a nation, we do not do anything like enough to encourage sport and physical recreation. I exempt the Minister for Sport from my criticisms. I have total confidence in her. I know that she would like to do more to give sport the priority and importance that it deserves. However, sport will be taken seriously only when it has a department of its own with its own—greater—resources, providing joined-up government across the various Departments. Education and Employment, Environment, Transport and the Regions, Health and the Home Office are four obvious ones. What role does the Minister feel that sport offers the social exclusion unit and vice versa?

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: The hon. Gentleman said that a ministry of sport should have more resources; would he care to put a figure on that?

Mr. Russell: That is a good question. The figure is not available, but the hon. Member for Ryedale provided a shopping list of various organisations whence that came. If we are to have joined-up government, we must work out the cost to the public purse of criminal damage, unhealthy children and so on. Such matters cannot be put into compartments. The hon. Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Thomas) may want to do that, but joined-up government means more than just putting a price on something.

Today's debate is on probably the quietest parliamentary Thursday of the year, and in the training room of Westminster Hall instead of the main stadium of the House, which epitomises the Government's attitude to sport. "A Sporting Future for All" was launched on 5 April, not in the House, but in a publicity stunt in Haringey, with two Secretaries of State squabbling over who should take the credit. When reference to that discourtesy was made in the House, Madam Speaker deplored what had occurred, but neither the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport nor the Secretary of State for Education and Employment was present for the admonition. It fell to the Minister for Sport, who had been frozen out of the launch that morning, to take the rap and to apologise because the document had not been presented to the House first.

It had all been different a few hours earlier. On the morning of 5 April, the Department for Culture, Media and Sport issued a press release headed "Smith and Hoey launch a sporting future for all". It contained a two-paragraph quote from the Minister for Sport. That release was quickly pulled and a new one was issued jointly by the Department for Culture, Media and Sport and the Department for Education and Employment. The opening words stated:

> David Blunkett and Chris Smith today launched a radical boost in access to school sport.

The name of the Minister for Sport had been removed from that second press release, as had her comments. Her words had been replaced with three paragraphs of quotes from the Secretary of State for Education. That sums up the Government's real attitude towards sport—even the Minister for Sport was sidelined when they launched their sports strategy.

"A Sporting Future for All" includes an introduction by the Prime Minister:

[Mr. Russell]

> For all of us who take up sport, a good start in the early years is important... It is in school where most of us get our first chance to try sport. It is here that children discover their talent and their potential. They need the chance to try a variety of sports to see which they enjoy most. They need high quality teaching of basic skills.

I am sure that we all endorse those fine words from the Prime Minister, but what will the Secretary of State for Education and Employment do to make them reality? The evidence is that our schools, because of Government policies, are failing our children in sport and physical education. No amount of fine words and glossy pamphlets can hide that stark reality.

"A Sporting Future for All" includes a section headed "The Vision" and the chapter "Sport in Education" has my total support, but will the Government deliver what they state? The strategy statement, "Increasing Participation by Young People", states:

> Physical education and sport are a fundamental part of the education of all young people.

No one would argue with that, or with the further comment that > in too many schools physical education and sport have declined.

But the policies of successive Governments have caused that; schools did not choose to bring that about.

The pledge of financial support for sport in schools is welcome, but it must be put in context because it is not a lot when spread across the country. Although 110 specialist sports colleges by 2003 is better than nothing, there are 3,560 state secondary schools in England; £150 million for primary schools is also better than nothing, but there are 18,234 such schools in England. The sum is less than one fifth of that spent on the millennium dome—talking of which, would the Minister care to comment on the proposal to the dome legacy competition that its long-term use should be as a sports dome featuring 50 sports, making it the largest concentration of sports ever assembled under one roof anywhere in the world? The £240 million support for schools to provide out-of-school-hours activities is also welcome, but the Minister knows that that is too little for the country as a whole. How many youngsters aged 14 and over will have time to make use of them when they are burdened with so much studying at home?

Perhaps the Minister will draw to the attention of all the Education Ministers paragraph 2.4 on page 8, which states:

> These plans will allow a new start for sport in schools. We know that excellent physical education and school sport are a key part of an effective school. Sporting achievement and academic standards go hand in hand.

Furthermore, the opening sentence of paragraph 7.1 on page 29 states:

> Physical education is an essential part of a broad and balanced curriculum.

If the Government are serious about wanting to reverse the decline of physical education and sport in schools, and improve the quality of provision for all young people, they must provide the resources to match the warm words. They must also let Education Ministers proclaim time and again that sporting achievements and academic standards go hand in hand. In that way, perhaps educationists at all levels will get the message. Up to now, I have concentrated on sport in schools, because unless we quickly reverse the trends of recent years, the future for UK sport will be even more bleak than it is.

Football has never had as much money as it has now. However, the English professional game is arguably worse off than ever before, and our long-term future on the international scene is threatened. Huge sums are concentrated among a few clubs, but instead of the money being used for the wider benefit of the sport at all levels, it is going into the grotesque salaries of a relatively small number of overrated, over-priced and overpaid professionals, who, with their parasite agents, are sucking vast sums of money out of the game.

The Government should be considering financial strategies to redistribute the wealth in football so that it benefits the many and not the few. I invite the Minister to discuss this matter with her Treasury colleagues. What I propose would not involve additional public expenditure. Grass-roots football—junior clubs and youth teams at all levels—would have their fortunes and facilities transformed by a redistribution of the money that is sloshing around the highest reaches of the professional game before being grabbed by a greedy minority.

The smaller professional and semi-professional clubs which do so much to promote football in all parts of the country would also benefit. To put this into perspective, Manchester United's annual wage bill is the equivalent of the cost of building several new stadiums for second and third division clubs—I declare an interest in relation to my home club, Colchester United—as well as those in the feeder leagues.

A few days ago, I received a letter from the chairman of Yeovil Town football club, which plays in the Football Conference, the feeder league to the Nationwide Football League. The total attendance at all Conference matches this season will be at a record level for the third year running. Many such small-town clubs have an active programme to develop their role and activities in the community. However, Conference clubs are ineligible for grant aid from the Football Association to run official football academies for young players in their towns, although assistance can be given to the bigger clubs. The Government must sort out such unfairness, as it is yet another example of how the football authorities allow the big clubs to dictate what happens in our main national sport.

Mr. Greenway: May I, as president of York City football club, bring some good news to the hon. Gentleman? A working party consisting of three third division chairmen has been set up, headed by the chairman of York City, Douglas Craig. It will examine how support for the Conference can be improved, and how more clubs in the Conference can be promoted to the Football League. One never knows—Yeovil Town might make it.

Mr. Russell: I am most grateful for that intervention. An increased number of clubs entering the Football League from the Conference would also mean an increase in the number going out. York City should be very wary of that.

Although the Minister has referred to some money from the premiership being distributed to lower levels, the amount is minute. It could be conscience money. It has, in a way, taken our eye off the ball, because 5 per cent. of premier division money is not a vast sum, when we think of all the money that is floating around.

If the strategies and recommendations of "A Sporting Future for All" are implemented, and provided that sufficient financial resources and quality coaching are made available, we can perhaps look forward to a better future for the nation's sport, not only in terms of national success, but at all levels. We should encourage participation by all, not just by those who have the potential to be the elite performers in their sport, and not just in the major sports, such as football, rugby, cricket, hockey, tennis, swimming, and athletics, but in the so-called minority sports.

The current British sabre champion is a young man from my constituency. The Minister may recall receiving earlier this year a letter from that young man's father. His story illustrates, on one hand, the aspirations set out in "A Sporting Future for All" and, on the other, the stark reality for our talented young people, who are cheated of the chance to realise their full potential. My constituent, Robin Knight, now aged 20, joined Colchester fencing club at the age of 11, after attending an introductory session at his school. His considerable talent was quickly recognised. Fencing is a minority sport in this country, but it is big in other parts of Europe. Last year, it cost Mr. Knight—or, more precisely, his parents—almost £10,000 to cover the cost of his equipment, training fees and travel and hotel costs for major events. For the world championships in Korea, he received £500 from the national sports organisation, of which £474 went to pay his air fare. He had to buy his track suit, for which the balance of £26 was inadequate.

The Government must provide more support, if the best of our young people are to succeed on the national stage. Had it not been for his parents, it is unlikely that Mr. Knight would have been able to compete for his country. If there were a proper level of support, his international prospects would be improved immensely. Incidentally, I would also welcome further support for our talented sportsmen and sportswomen from British industry. At the recent sabre international tournament in London, the Spanish team was sponsored by Wilkinson Sword Ltd. The same company has rejected a request that it sponsor Robin Knight, the British champion. That attitude is regrettable.

Support from large and small companies is appreciated, but it should be regarded as top-up, rather than core funding. I pay tribute to Lancaster garages, one of many sponsoring companies, which is helping the training of a gifted young athlete from my constituency, Sarah Claxton, who, many believe, has the potential to become an Olympic medallist in four years' time. The Minister should consider what help can be given to Miss Claxton and others. I would also welcome some comment from the Minister on the extraordinary fact that the British Olympic Association is one of only two national Olympic committees that do not receive public money. The Government should take measures to ensure that our sportsmen and sportswomen compete on a level playing field.

Nothing should take away from the importance of the voluntary contribution that so many people make to sport in this country. They are the backroom men and women, without whose dedication our sport would be even more impoverished. The Central Council of Physical Recreation described volunteers as "the foundations of British sport".

That is true, and one small way to recognise it would be for the Government to exempt volunteers from having to pay for the criminal record checks that will soon be introduced. I also endorse the CCPR's proposal that voluntary sports clubs should be eligible for mandatory rate relief. I have been told that the future of Brighton and Hove cricket club has been put in jeopardy because of a demand for £5,594 in business rates. It would not be too costly for the Government to grant rate relief to sports clubs throughout the country, but it would be more than repaid in what those clubs could do to promote sports, if they were no longer faced with a battle for survival.

The Minister will, I hope, be pleased to hear that my comments on the fiasco of the Wembley stadium development will be brief. She knows that when I got a question about it on to the Order Paper, it was mysteriously shunted off to the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, even though it dealt with Wembley stadium and the Wembley task force. Methinks, in the light of what the hon. Member for Ryedale said, that there was a conspiracy of some sort to prevent it from being raised in the House. I am astonished at the Government's vandalism, allowing the demolition of arguably the most famous stadium in the world.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Member is not suggesting that Ministers are adopting an unacceptable attitude, because that would not be correct.

Mr. Russell: If any offence was caused by my remarks, I withdraw them. The Minister and I have corresponded on and discussed these matters, and my comment was made in jest.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Unfortunately, Hansard has no way of indicating that a comment was made in jest. We might suggest that it introduce a suitable symbol, but I hate to think where such a precedent would end.

Mr. Russell: I am not suggesting anything untoward, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Returning to the demolition of Wembley stadium, I am astonished that the Government should be such vandals, allowing the demolition, as I said, of arguably the most famous stadium in the world. Historians will look back in amazement at the destruction of this important 20th-century building, which was the venue for England's most important sporting triumph—winning the football world cup in 1966—and the 1948 Olympic games. It is to be replaced by an ugly stadium in which only 40 major sporting events a year will be allowed, and which will still be served by a grossly inadequate road and rail system. What a waste of money. The total cost of the project approaches that of the dome. Perhaps some will think that the stadium is better value for money, but sports men and women in general may think that money would have been better spent on a different site, at a lower cost, leaving funds for other sports developments.

The Government rightly oppose in principle the sale of school playing fields, although reality has not matched the rhetoric. Of the scores of applications received, only a handful has been rejected. The Minister will agree that, on some occasions, the disposal of surplus space can generate income for all-weather pitches or sports halls, which constitute better overall neighbourhood sports provision. However, the sale of playing fields by companies and public bodies poses more of a threat.

In my constituency, the Royal London Mutual Insurance Society plans to sell its playing fields, which include four football pitches, for commercial development. The Government, through the Ministry of Defence and the national health service, also eagerly hope to sell sports fields. I hope that they will not operate double standards in respect of pitches that they own. Nor should planning guidelines relating to brownfield and greenfield developments be ignored.

Overall, "A Sporting Future for All", which promises much, is to be welcomed. Delivery will be eagerly anticipated, and further progress and improvements sought. I know that the Minister wishes to achieve sport for all, and I wish her every success in her endeavours. In that regard, she can count on constructive support from Liberal Democrats.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Before I call the next speaker, I should point out that a number of Members want to contribute to the debate. I am not seeking to restrain hon. Members, but they should bear in mind that a degree of discipline will enable those who wish to speak to do so before the afternoon is over.

4.18 pm

Dr. Howard Stoate (Dartford): I shall endeavour to be reasonably brief.

As one of a small but select band of hon. Members who recently participated in the London marathon, I feel qualified to contribute to this afternoon's debate. I am the fastest marathon runner among current hon. Members, but before I am accused of boasting, I should point out that I fall a long way short of the record holder, Matthew Parris, who was considerably faster. I should like to place on record my thanks to hon. Members for their generous sponsorship, which helped me to raise more than £2,500 for Mencap.

As you would expect, Madam Deputy Speaker, I shall put a slight medical spin on the debate. A doctor might define sport as a way of making exercise purposeful and enjoyable, and which encourages people to keep it up. The nation's broom cupboards must be full of many thousands of exercise bikes and rowing machines, bought in good faith but abandoned due to inertia and boredom of a solitary activity. Therefore, one great advantage of sport is that it is often a communal activity. People may also feel that, if they do not turn up to play regularly, they are letting their colleagues down. That camaraderie is what makes sport different from routine exercise, which can be boring.

Why is exercise so important? Most people are preoccupied with living for as long as possible, and in that respect the evidence about exercise is stark. People who take regular exercise gain significantly, in terms of their chances of staying alive, over those who do not do so. The figures are astonishing. People who exercise commonly suffer only half the rate of heart disease and stroke that is suffered by those who exercise very little or not at all. People double their chances of dying early by not taking regular exercise—it is as simple as that.

Unfortunately, Britain does not fare well in the incidence of heart disease and stroke—we are very near the bottom of the European Union league table. In France, there are 36 deaths per 100,000 a year from circulatory disease among people under the age of 65. Britain has 70 deaths per 100,000 among people in the same age group. We have twice the rate of heart disease in France. Proof that exercise—of which sport is a major form—can improve matters should alone spur people to continue.

Unfortunately, some people are significantly more at risk than others. Women do not take part in sport as much as men, and are at greater risk of having a stroke. Thus, they not only find it more difficult to take part in sporting activities, but are more at risk from not doing so. It is a double whammy. People from south Asia have a significantly higher risk of heart disease than people from other ethnic groups.

Britain has a significant health problem, and sport is part of the solution. We therefore need a strategy to increase sporting participation among people in general, as well as targeting it at specific groups. "A Sporting Future for All" is important because it sets out such a strategy. However, there are significant barriers to achieving some of the document's aims—for example, the recommended level of activity.

A physician would say that 20 to 30 minutes of good quality exercise four or five times a week should keep the average person in reasonably good shape. The problem is that people's life styles often make that difficult to achieve. Working hours in Britain—48 hours a week on average—are among the longest in Europe. Balancing the competing demands of work, family and other activities deters many people from regularly taking part in sport. For the socially excluded, access is denied not only by lack of time, but by lack of opportunity. Sporting facilities can be financially and geographically well beyond their reach.

Good habits must be promoted early on in life; it is important to encourage people to take part in regular sport from the earliest possible age. That is why I am pleased that the Government have, to a large extent, focused their resources on primary schools. If primary school children begin to exercise regularly, it is much more likely that they will continue to do so throughout their lives. As the hon. Member for Colchester (Mr. Russell) said, the current generation of children is far less fit than previous generations. That is partly due to the fact that some schools do not take sport sufficiently seriously. I am pleased that the document proposes a framework for remedying that.

Unfortunately, however, there is more to the matter. In today's society, children are far more likely, when they come in from school, to play on the computer or watch television than to socialise with their colleagues and friends or engage in sporting activities. My children regularly take part in sport, but I have to remind them to turn off the computer or television and go out to play football or go to the park with their bikes. It is a struggle, because society has a couch-potato mentality. When people get in from school or work, they tend to slouch in front of the television, and it is difficult to get them to take sport more seriously.

As a doctor, I assure hon. Members that sport improves not only physical but mental fitness. People who say to me in my medical capacity, "I feel far too tired to exercise", have got things the wrong way round. The more that one exercises, the less tired one feels. If, when I get home after a difficult day's debating in the House, I go for a 10-mile run, I return from it feeling absolutely marvellous. It gives me an enormous boost. [Laughter.] I do not know whether Hansard will pick up those nuances.

People talk about the endorphin rush, which involves natural morphine-like substances that everyone has in their brain—such substances are entirely legal and the police cannot touch people for using them. They give one precisely the same buzz—allegedly—as recreational drugs, but with far fewer health risks and no risk of being caught and prosecuted. Many scientific studies have documented the fact that mental well-being after a heavy bout of exercise is not to be sniffed at. [Laughter.] I use that word advisedly.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. We should treat this subject with great seriousness.

Dr. Stoate: I do not wish to be flippant—this is a serious issue, and I do not want to give the impression that I do not take it extremely seriously.

Medically speaking, there is nothing better than regular exercise to keep one's body and mind in trim, and sport is an extremely good way of doing that. We have heard much this afternoon about the Government's approach, and I am pleased that the document sets out a detailed strategy. That will ensure that the Government play their part in helping schools and communities to develop sporting activities. The focus may largely be on primary schools, but in my constituency, Dartford grammar school—a secondary school—is the host of the Beckett centre, which is a sporting facility that is open to the entire community. The school uses the facility during the day, and the community makes great use of it at evenings and weekends. There are many ways in which schools can participate to ensure that everyone makes the best use of such facilities.

The Government are to set up 110 specialist sports colleges by 2003. I am slightly disappointed that one school in my area was unable to become one. After an unfavourable report by the Office for Standards in Education, Dartford West boys school intended to become a sports college, but the local education authority did not want to pursue that approach and chose instead to close the school. There was little that the Government could do, and, unfortunately, the school will close in due course. However, there are opportunities for schools elsewhere—the Government are committed to setting up a significant number of sports colleges, and they will have a significant impact.

Various local initiatives are being pursued in my constituency. For example, there are significant efforts to promote increased involvement in sport by women. I am the president of a cycling club in Dartford, Team Darenth, which is trying to increase the number of girls and young women who cycle. Women have not taken up cycling as a sport to the same extent as men, but we are considering using trained women cycling instructors to help to encourage young women to do so, which should make a significant difference.

Another initiative seeks to encourage young disabled people in my constituency to get into sport. That should ensure that disabled people, whatever their disability, have the same opportunities as everyone else to take part in sport.

My overarching theme is that, however unfit people may feel—however unable they believe they are to take part in sport—there is always a sport that they could do. There is no such thing as someone who is maximally fit; it is always possible for people to become fitter. People who are supremely fit can get fitter, and those who are supremely unfit can always find ways to become fitter. People may feel that they are so unfit that it would be dangerous for them to exercise or take part in sport, but that is not right. With proper training and instruction, people can always become fitter, which will improve their quality of life.

I do not treat this debate flippantly; it is of an extremely important matter. Anything that encourages sport for all will be of great benefit to all, whatever their ability or background.

Mr. Colin Breed (South-East Cornwall): I should like to make four brief and somewhat parochial points. I agree with much of what has been said, and I do not want to repeat points that have already been made. We appear to have reached a significant degree of agreement.

First, there is a perception that because rural areas are covered by greenfield or brownfield areas, local people have ready access to open areas for recreation and sport, but that is not so. Many such fields are commercial concerns. Young people in rural areas often do not have the access to playing fields that people assume. Even when relatively small and poor parish councils can get a few coppers together to buy a bit of ground, the bureaucracy and safety issues involved prove far too great a problem. I hope that, in moves to deal with playing fields and access for everyone, it will be recognised that rural areas sometimes need additional support because of the costs of providing playing fields.

Secondly, I think that we all agree that we have lost far too many playing fields. I hope that the Minister can find a means, through discussion with colleagues in other Departments, of establishing a direct presumption against development, because development causes some of the sales—although that is not to say that there will always be a case for such presumption. Local authorities sell their playing fields because that provides them with a contribution. Development can take place on them, so they acquire a development value. Participation in sport that could be retained is lost because land with development value is sold.

Thirdly, as regards voluntary clubs, I hope that the proposals will go right down to the grass roots. We have heard some big figures. The football club in my home town has nine teams; it gets sponsorship from local business for its shirts, and we are all enjoined to sponsor the match ball and everything else. However, the poor young people who go along have to provide £2.50 each week to pay the local authority to use the ground. Everyone else seems to be putting in, but parents with two children who want to go along have to find £5 a week—week in, week out—which is a lot. It is good to have rate relief on ground fees for sports clubs, but there should be some other sort of relief so that young people, in particular, can use playing fields without having to stump up out of their pocket money. That is grass roots stuff.

Fourthly, we all recognise the importance of school sport. The difficulty in rural areas—as those of us who have tried to promote after-school sport know—is that most children use transport, such as school buses. The bus goes at quarter-past or half-past 3, but anyone who wants to stay on after school will not be ready to leave until quarter to 5 or 5 o'clock, when the bus has gone. There is also the problem of parents coming for their children. The school where I was the chairman of the board of governors tried to devise a system whereby we had an early bus and a late bus. However, the cost of the service relative to our budget made it prohibitive, even though many children wanted to avail themselves of it.

There is a lurking problem in school sport; such problems sometimes build up because they have become excuses for doing nothing. The problem relates to safety. Schools are concerned about becoming the subject of litigation if a child breaks his leg or neck or suffers some other major injury. They therefore face the additional cost of providing safer equipment.

The other day, I discovered that providing cricket helmets for children to participate in the sport would cost £30 or £40 a child. Of course, if children do not have a helmet and have an accident, the school will be liable to significant litigation. That is a growing problem. Indeed, there are similar developments in other areas of society, where people are only too keen to pick up the telephone to ring the nearest solicitor who happens to advertise on the back of a bus to inquire whether the solicitor might be keen to pursue the case of someone who is injured.

A more nationally based policy is needed to enable schools to protect themselves, so that sport, which can be accidentally dangerous, can be continued as safely as possible but with a recognition that accidents can happen. There is no need for hugely expensive insurance premiums or massive budgets for possibly unnecessary safety equipment. Those are practical issues at the smaller, school end.

I hope that all the report's aims and objectives are achieved as quickly as possible. There are only a few hon. Members present, yet probably the one thing that most constituents talk about during the week is sport. They are not really interested in the euro, or other such things. They and their children talk about and watch sport. It is something in which both men and women and boys and girls participate and talk about far more often than we realise.

4.35 pm

Mr. Alan Keen (Feltham and Heston): I am grateful not to have been called immediately after my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Dr. Stoate) because, after his frequent mention of heart attacks and the speed of his delivery, I was left exhausted, despite the fact that I far exceed his recommendations on weekly exercise. I congratulate my hon. Friend and his three colleagues who completed the London marathon more quickly than I dare dream about. I know that because they cost me at least four weeks' pocket money in sponsorship.

I did not intend to mention politics, even on this election day, but I was inspired by the hon. Member for Colchester (Mr. Russell). I was reminded a couple of weeks ago about this issue because I was flattered to find that Brentford football club, Queen's Park Rangers and Wasps were competing for the development of the Feltham marina site adjacent to Feltham station in my constituency. A 35,000-seater football stadium and an ice rink are to be built there. I was reminded—not by a Liberal Democrat—that a long time ago the Liberal Democrats in Richmond demolished the ice rink. I am not saying that they let people down after promising to rebuild it, but 25 years is a long time. It looks as though we are to have another rink in Feltham. Perhaps the people who are still waiting for the Richmond rink to be rebuilt will travel to Feltham; the journey from Richmond takes only eight minutes. I apologise for the politics.

I spoke to my hon. Friend the Minister for Sport before the debate began and was delighted to be told that she would speak for half an hour, a much shorter time than she took when she was a Back Bencher speaking about sport. I congratulate my hon. Friend not only on her appointment—this is the first time since she became Minister for Sport that I have spoken in a sports debate—but on the sports strategy, of which I am proud, despite the criticisms which can be made, one of which I have pointed out and to which I will return in a while. We should pay tribute also to the late Denis Howell and to my hon. Friends the Members for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) and for West Ham (Mr. Banks), who have contributed greatly to the development of sports policy over the years.

"Sport for All"—with "A Sporting Future for All" has included children, young people and older people, and those with disabilities. One thing that we do wrong is define sport too narrowly. I should like other pastimes to be brought into the arena of sport. We want to motivate everyone to become involved in activities that we may not now classify as sports but that can be developed as such if there is co-ordination among sporting bodies. In that way, we can widen the term "sport", instead of defining it too narrowly.

I apologise for repeating something that I mentioned in a previous sports debate. I was reminded of it by Trevor Brooking, who spoke at a meeting that I organised in Hounslow last week. He said that my right hon. Friend the Member for Redcar (Marjorie Mowlam) had taken him to an area where sport was used as part of the ammunition to regenerate a town that had been brought completely to its knees. Buses could not go through it because of vandalism and threats of violence. I was brought up in that town, and I know it well. Sport plays quite a part there. Middlesbrough football club has a centre in the town, where Frank Spraggon and Jim Platt, two ex-internationals, give coaching.

Sport has helped to bring the town back to what it was when I was a kid; as a child and a young man I spent most of my spare time playing all kinds of sports, all provided by the local authority. In the summer, eight of us played tennis from 9 o'clock in the morning. We paid for half an hour, and, knowing that no one else would come and that we did not have much money, the park attendant let us play on for six hours. We then went and played bowls; if young people were allowed on a bowling green nowadays, people would have their hearts in their mouths, but in those days we looked after everything. That is what sport can do.

We must ensure that the links between schools and clubs are maintained. As hon. Members have said, sport gives young people a feeling of belonging and a sense of ownership. The fact that they are participating and have something of value in their lives does so much to promote that feeling of belonging. If we can get young people to be involved in sport, they can be helped to improve their performance. In my constituency, people play sport at all sorts of levels, from my level, for example, to that of Mohammed Farrah, a fantastically promising distance runner, now aged 16, who looks like being an Olympic champion in four years or so. It does not matter what level people are at—if they are proud of what they do and gain satisfaction from what they achieve, even if it is only self-satisfaction, it will deter them from taking recreational drugs, which often lead to their taking harder drugs and damage people's lives. Another incentive for encouraging people to take part in sport is that it promotes a healthier life style, as my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford said. Think of the consequences for the national health service in the future if the population is healthier.

It is important to establish and strengthen the links between school sport, which we will improve in the next two or three years, and clubs; we must encourage young people to carry on participating in sport when they leave school. We must not lose those kids; I am not talking about compulsion—we do not want to force people to take part—but we do want to give them the opportunity to go on to clubs, and the sports co-ordinators will help them to do so.

My criticism of the strategy is that it makes only sparse reference to veterans' sport. The link between clubs and old-age pensioners needs to be continued; I have never entered for a marathon, but in the past two years I have started doing half-marathons, and managed to get to the end without stopping. That proves that sport can continue when people are older. There would be an even bigger improvement in the nation's health if we could encourage people to participate in sport later in life. My hon. Friend the Minister opened the veterans' world athletics championships at Gateshead last year and they were thrilled by what she said.

It is difficult for people to play sport, especially team sports, when they leave school. I broke the link and did not play active team sports for 20 or 25 years, until I came to this place in 1992 and, finding that it was so much like the public schools that I had read about at school, I started playing team games again. Let me put in a plug for the parliamentary football team which is playing a charity game next Monday at the Stadium of Light against the north-east press, including part of the old Sunderland cup-winning side of 1973. That shows that the ability to play sport can extend well into the advanced years.

Our parliamentary football team also played in an international tournament in Portugal last summer. To our credit, we came fourth, missing second place only on penalties. As one who called for the resignation of the previous England manager for not practising penalties, I must point out that we were beaten by the Italians in a penalty shoot-out. Italy scored eight consecutive penalties and we scored seven—twice as many as the England side has ever achieved. I therefore feel justified about my comments, as coach, when I criticised the previous England manager. If the present England manager would like to include any of our top players in his squad, he could bring us on 30 seconds from the end of a draw to take all the penalties.

Mr. Greenway: Name them.

Mr. Keen: I could name them, all right.

My hon. Friend the Minister spoke about veterans' athletics, which shows what can be achieved. These people competed in athletics at a high level to begin with, but greatly extended their competition years. I spent three or four days there and was most impressed with an Englishman who broke the world 200 m record for over 45-year-olds. I forget his exact time, but the professionals who organised the games at the Gateshead stadium were most impressed. The man was 47 and was asked about his lifetime's best. He was expected to say that he achieved a faster time 20 years earlier, but he said, "That was it." He ran his best ever race at the age of 47, which shows how people can carry on over the years and keep up a healthy life style.

As a member of the Select Committee on Culture, Media and Sport, which investigated the future of the Wembley stadium complex, I bet that, if we successfully bid for the 2012 Olympics, they will take place on a concrete platform in the present stadium, not at Pickett's Lock. The present Sports Minister may even be Prime Minister by then, but whoever is, he will rubber-stamp that decision.

Finally, I offer my best wishes to the British Olympic Association. I know all about the wonderful preparation that it made in Queensland for the Olympics. All the administrators and athletes, who will travel there from all over the world, should also be thanked.

4.48 pm

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas (Harrow, West): I should declare an interest as a supporter of Harrow borough football club, which is in the Ryman premier league. I am sponsoring its final home match of the season on Saturday. On each of the two occasions that I have sponsored the team in the past, they have scored five goals. They need one point to be sure of staying in the Ryman premier league. I hope that they will score five goals again on Saturday to ensure their survival.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. This has been an interesting and instructive debate, but seldom has so much free advertisement been offered to so many sporting venues.

Mr. Thomas: I am also a member of the London Welsh rugby football club whose recent application to join the Welsh-Scottish league will, I hope, be successful.

Sport is a crucial element of the social cement that binds our communities, as has already been said. As my hon. Friends the Members for Dartford (Dr. Stoate) and for Feltham and Heston (Mr. Keen) stressed in their contributions, it is also crucial to the physical and mental well-being of our citizens. The links between the lack of participation in sport and the greater propensity to commit crime or play truant are well known and well documented.

The economic significance of sport is also profound, from the bed and breakfast on the Pembrokeshire coast for the sea kayaking enthusiast to the multi-million pound enterprise that is Manchester United. That issue has been discussed somewhat less, although the hon. Member for Colchester (Mr. Russell) touched on it. Ladbroke Racing Ltd. is based in my constituency and has started a new telephone-betting service within the past 12 months. My hon. Friend the Member for Feltham and Heston talked about where the 2012 Olympic games might be, and I invite him to put some money down and take advantage of the service that my constituents provide through Ladbroke Racing Ltd.

As I understand it, consumers spend £12 billion on sport, and the industry directly provides 420,000 jobs. Clearly, the Department of Trade and Industry can also play a crucial role in a strategy for sport to foster the sports industry. I hope that the relationship that already exists, as I understand it, between the sports industry, the DTI and the Department for Culture, Media and Sport will continue to grow.

I warmly welcome the excellent document "A Sporting Future for All", and my hon. Friend the Minister deserves considerable praise for producing it. The twin-track vision of increasing participation for all in sport and driving up success rates for British athletes is absolutely right. As hon. Members have said, particularly focused efforts need to be directed at continuing to increase the participation of women and ethnic minorities.

I also strongly support the moves to modernise the administration and support structures for sports, in particular for our Olympic medallists. It is worth highlighting the fact that we came ninth in the 1980 Moscow Olympics. Five Olympic games on, at Atlanta in 1996, we plummeted to 36th place. The decline in the colour of medals won has been even greater: we won one gold medal in 1996, compared with five at Barcelona four years earlier. We won 34 medals in all at the 1988 Seoul Olympics, 20 at Barcelona four years later and went down to 15 at Atlanta in 1996. The drive to raise the level of support that we offer to our most talented athletes is crucial.

Interest in sport begins in the main—although not exclusively—when we are young. Sport England's survey on young people and sport, which my hon. Friends have highlighted, offers a number of positive news stories. Both boys and girls are increasingly likely to play team sports. Between 1994 and 1999, the proportion of boys taking part frequently rose from 72 to 75 per cent. Among girls, the proportion went up from 34 to 42 per cent. The proportion of children taking part in after-school sport rose from 74 to 79 per cent. That shows that there have been some successes over the past five years in relation to sport in schools and among young people.

However, areas of concern remain, as my hon. Friends have said. I want to highlight the fact—again from the Sport England survey—that only 17 per cent. of primary schools have access to a multi-purpose sports hall. I understand that the figure for secondary schools is four times higher, although that in turn means that at least 30 per cent. of secondary schools are without access to a multi-purpose sports hall.

We should not be complacent about the quality of the multi-purpose halls that we have. Whitmore high school in my constituency has particular problems getting a range of children into the hall, because it is not big enough. In that context, the £150 million investment in the worst parts of school sports facilities that was announced when the document was released is enormously welcome, as is Sport England's commitment that 20 per cent. of lottery funds will be made available to youth sports.

As other hon. Members have said, the survey also highlighted the decline in the number of children receiving physical education each week in our schools. However, it is worth pointing out that the proportion spending more time on average in PE lessons has more than trebled: in 1994, 5 per cent. of pupils received between 30 and 59 minutes of PE a week, and that figure has now risen to 18 per cent. The story is not all doom and gloom. Falls in the amount of time spent in PE lessons were particularly pronounced in primary schools, which is of concern.

In a written answer on 9 March, the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment, my hon. Friend the Member for Redditch (Jacqui Smith) stated:

> Ofsted's 1999 review of primary schools in England found that overall progress in PE is satisfactory or better in 97 per cent. of schools...We have set an aspiration that all schools should provide two hours of curricular or extra-curricular activities a week. [Official Report, 9 March 2000; Vol. 345, c. 792W.]

That is welcome, but we need to keep the matter under close review to see whether we are succeeding in increasing PE provision for children at primary school.

I would prefer the compulsory option, but the Government were right to focus on driving up levels of literacy and numeracy, to which the previous Government paid insufficient attention. I notice that Sport England give a kite mark to schools that have good access to sport. Perhaps Ofsted or Sport England should start to indicate those primary schools that do not give proper access to sport. Sport England has also highlighted the urgency of addressing the issues. It says that despite the attractions and advantages of PE and school sport, there is increasing evidence that many young people have worryingly low levels of fitness.

We need to get the amount of time spent on PE right. It is also crucial to get the PE training for teachers right. As little as six hours training and professional development is on occasion devoted to physical education in initial teacher training and a substantial increase is needed. I should also like to suggest bursaries for those undertaking PE teacher training courses so that we can encourage the best applicants for PE education. We should do more to celebrate the successful, hard working and enthusiastic PE staff on whom we rely.

I remember Bob Longman from my own days at Hatch End high school in my constituency. He drove us to complete the cross-country circuits that he had devised around our school, which left me with a great love of running. He is still imparting that enthusiasm to many other young people at Hatch End high school. Perhaps we could encourage that further through the teachers' Oscars that Lord Puttnam has successfully developed.

We have done excellent work to prevent the compulsory sale of playing fields. The idea of the audit for sporting facilities is enormously welcome. Harrow council's audit highlighted the south Harrow area in my constituency as defective in sports provision, particularly football. When money is allocated from Sport England or from central Government expenditure, we should focus not just on boroughs with high levels of deprivation, but on areas that have pockets of deprivation. In particular, Harrow's athletics facility needs to be upgraded. I hope that Harrow athletics club, which uses the Bannister playing fields in Hatch End, will shortly receive funding for modernisation.

I hope that pressure will be put on the Rugby Football Union and UK Athletics, through meetings with the Department for Culture, Media and Sport, to ensure that the 5 per cent. revenue from television resources is allocated soon—if it has not been already—to grass-roots sport. In my constituency, that might help Pinner and Grammarians rugby club and Old Gaytonians rugby club to raise their aspirations further.

The hub and spoke model for developing voluntary club structures is excellent. Harrow Borough football club, which I mentioned earlier, is enthusiastically developing a support scheme with Ruislip Rangers, so that teams for five to 17-year-olds, leading to the adult team, can be based at Harrow Borough. Lottery sports funding for an artificial turf pitch would be particularly useful on that site, and would further that aim.

I throw out to my hon. Friend the Minister the suggestion that, in addition to an audit of sports facilities, there must also be an audit of the number of grass-roots coaching staff. Increased resources could be allocated to fund trained professionals to coach young people.

I want to highlight the problem facing canoeists in Britain. About 11,000 miles of upland river and tranquil lowland river would be navigable if access agreements were in place. Sadly, canoeists have agreements for just 2.8 per cent. of those rivers, so the challenge of canoeing on upland rivers, which are often fast and exciting, and can offer rough white-water conditions, is frequently denied.

There has not been a great deal of politics in the debate, but it was a shame that the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) ducked his party's record on sport expenditure, which dropped in real terms in the last four budgets of the Tory Government. It was 3.2 per cent. in 1994-95, 1 per cent. in 1995-96, 6.7 per cent. in 1996-97 and 6.5 per cent. in 1997-98.

We should examine the tax relief and charitable status of voluntary clubs and whether there is anything else that we can do. I am an enthusiastic supporter of the idea that we should bring the Olympics to London, not only because of the passion that it would generate and the stimulus that it would give the country, but because of the economic impact that it would have on London.

The document that the Minister has produced is an excellent and welcome step, and I commend my additional points to her.

5.3 pm

Mr. Andrew Reed (Loughborough): It is a particular pleasure to participate in a sports debate, because although it can be noisy and rowdy, sport usually unites us across the Chamber. It is a bit of a shame that the debate has been held this afternoon, because I know that some hon. Members who regularly attend sports debates could not be here. I hope that we will have another opportunity to discuss the subject in the main Chamber.

I will declare an interest as an illustration—I do not want to bore everyone with localities. I am a member and a player at Birstall rugby football club, where I played on Sunday, and still play most weekends. Much of today's discussion has been about the links between schools and local clubs. With all due respect to Birstall rugby club, we are in the lowest of the lowest rugby leagues. I am also a member at Leicester Tigers, which will hopefully win the national league in the next two weekends. When we talk about a sport—in this case rugby—I understand the broad differences at its different levels. I pay £6 a week to play for my rugby club. I do not want to get out of paying that, but it just manages to cover the cost of our shirts and their washing throughout the season. Any money that filters down to a local club such as ours is important, because the link between the school and the club has broken down over the past 15 years.

My hon. Friend the Member for Feltham and Heston (Mr. Keen) mentioned veterans. At 35, and with all due respect to those of that age, I have suddenly realised that I am eligible for veterans' rugby. Unfortunately, I am one of the younger players in the club, as there has been a 15-year break in rugby at the local school, so no youngsters are coming through. There is a danger that clubs like ours will fold. We are now down to one or two teams every Saturday, and the future looks bleak. There have been many amalgamations between local clubs because of a lack of players coming through.

The level of participation is crucial to developing a sporting future for all. The Lawn Tennis Association gave a clear example of that in a presentation three or four weeks ago, showing that 160,000 youngsters play competitive tennis on an average Saturday morning in France, but about 20,000 do so in the United Kingdom. Among the top 30 tennis players, the French have six or seven; we have two. It does not take a genius to work out that the two countries have similar populations. On a pro rata basis, we should surely have the same level of achievement as our French counterparts. The link with the participation levels at under-14 years and under-15 years is clear. We simply do not have enough young participants.

After a few years of playing rugby on a Saturday afternoon, I admit that, like my hon. Friend the Member for Feltham and Heston, it has been a revelation to me to enter the House and find that I can take part in football, hockey, tennis, swimming and a variety of other sports. Some of us, including some hon. Members present, are members of the gymnasium. I apologise if the group of rather sporting Members of Parliament before you, Madam Deputy Speaker, is not representative of them all. I was pleasantly surprised at the level of sporting participation in the House, and at some of the past and present standards of one or two hon. Members.

We held a parliamentary rugby world cup in October, with New Zealand, South Africa, Japan, France, Ireland and ourselves participating. The visit of the new Japanese Prime Minister yesterday reminded us of how important that was. He was a try scorer in one of the Japanese team's games. He was not injured, unlike their Chief Whip in our game against them. I have great visions of him being carried off to the ambulance on a stretcher, mobile phone attached to his ear, dictating his press release. I am glad to say that he did not suffer too badly.

That tournament is an example of the links that can be made. We have played rugby regularly with the New Zealand Sports Minister. When it comes to sport, friendships cross the world. The tone of today's debate is indicative of the fact that the friendships from parliamentary sports teams are replicated by the way in which team mates work and interact in the House.

Loughborough is a prime example of how a sports strategy can be implemented. The university is famous for its sporting excellence, not only in the United Kingdom, but worldwide. I am delighted that it has been chosen as one of the hubs for the United Kingdom Sports Institute. I hope that the swimming pool, one of the star attractions of the £28 million-worth of work that will be done over the next two years, is started as quickly as possible. Also, a sports college will be located next to the university.

Loughborough is also home to the Youth Sport Trust, which, through the BT Tops programme, provides kits for primary schools and ensures that primary school teachers can teach basic team sports and games. Although participation has declined, I dread to think what it would have been without the Youth Sport Trust and the £7 million from Sport England, as well as money from organisations such as BT.

I shall briefly run through the points that hon. Members have made. Overall, the Government's strategy must be welcomed. It is not the usual glossy White Paper, with 50 or 60 words on the front, a bit in the background and a few pictures. I welcome the fact that it is a fairly wordy document, because it addresses the needs of the sports community rather than sports headline writers. It talks to people who participate in sport, run sport and know what it is all about. I pay tribute to Sue Campbell of the Youth Sport Trust, who used her wide experience and expertise, gained through her direct participation at all levels of sport, to ensure that the document speaks to the sports community. The Government's strategy is excellent because it brings all those strands together.

We need to ensure greater participation in primary schools. Teacher training is an element of that, but there has also to be a link at secondary school level between schools and local clubs. School sports co-ordinators must work closely with existing resources—most counties have a rugby development officer, a tennis development officer and so on—so that activities are better co-ordinated, using the local clubs base to bring on the most talented youngsters and give them greater access to participation. Various parts of the country experience difficulties in that regard. I have a semi-rural constituency and agree with the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Breed) on the problems faced by rural areas, such as small primary schools. I know one school that does not have enough pupils in a class year to put together an 11-a-side football team. If every boy in a class year wanted to play, and even if girls participated, they would have a team of only nine players. The school has successfully encouraged cross-country running and pupils run regularly on Saturday mornings, but team sports are seriously lacking. Add to that the transport problems experienced in the countryside and such schools are excluded from participating in sport.

We need to co-ordinate existing facilities. The Minister is right that there are many examples of best practice and good practice. If I visit the campus of Loughbourough university on any Friday afternoon, I can bump into a couple of hundred world athletes of various kinds. I did not realise that for three weeks there had been a new world champion life-saver and that he is British—the assumption is that we do not have world champions in this country—and based at Loughborough university. I did not know that there were life-saving world championships until that individual came back with the gold medal. We are doing well in many areas and we need to ensure that we replicate the best practice across the country.

The fact that there is a great deal of money in sport holds it back. The arts lobby and others have done well in coming to the Government for money and get most of their sponsorship money from that source, but people assume that sport, particularly football, has money. Those of us who participate in games—at a very different level—recognise that although a great deal of money goes into football, it filters quickly into the pay packets of the top premiership players. Football generally does not have a lot of money; that is a different concept. We need to ensure two things. First, at least 5 per cent. of that revenue should go to the grass roots, although I hope that we shall push for a higher percentage. Secondly, losing the television rights to non-terrestrial television poses a danger for the long-term health of some of the sports that we are discussing.

I declare an interest in rugby. I do not have Sky television, so I am unable to watch England matches played at home. The audience figures are worrying, because the vast majority of people are not able to watch England playing at Twickenham. If we are trying to increase participation levels, youngsters need to be given the get up and go to participate by seeing their sporting heroes play. As everyone knows, it is almost impossible to get a tennis court when Wimbledon is on—one can get a tennis court in the local park during the rest of the year, but for those two weeks, when tennis can be seen on television, youngsters go out and participate. I would like the vast majority of sport to be available on terrestrial television so that we can encourage more youngsters to participate and see their heroes participating at every level—and seeing an England or UK team doing extremely well, because that encourages people to play.

Facilities are important and I am pleased that progress has been made on the sale of playing fields, which is a complex issue. In my village, Quorn, Canes Field is a classic example—a cricket field that is held by a charitable trust. The trust wishes to offer it to developers, who are offering a much bigger and nicer area just outside the village on which they will build a pavilion. To the trustees, that seems an attractive option. Unfortunately, it would remove a green space from the centre of the village and replace it with one outside the village, which is difficult to access. As a result, parents will have to use a car to take their children to kick a football around or play in the outfield, whereas at the moment, on any evening, especially when the weather is good, one can see children playing in a local and accessible field, which parents regard as safe. Although it is an attractive option on paper, I have fought against it, and have been supported by Sport England, local authorities and the local community. It is symptomatic of the difficult decisions that have to be made, although it falls outside the scope of the current regulations because it is not technically a school playing field, even though the trust is part of the school.

Coming from a very small local club, I know that tax concessions, rate relief and so on would make an enormous difference to the viability of such clubs, which are the lifeblood of future England teams, at whatever level and in whatever sport. Unless people are participating, and facilities are available locally, it will be a struggle to achieve the aims of this fine document. A little money or a small concession, such as rate relief, which would avoid difficulties between different local authorities, or at least make clear what would be incurred in a particular part of the country, would make an enormous difference. Lots of other things could be done, such as the elite performance programme, but I do not want to concentrate on those today. The focus of the document is entirely right—it should concentrate on increasing participation. We have the necessary expertise at Loughborough, Bath and Sheffield, but it can bear fruit only if we have enough people whose talent can be developed. If we have an ever-decreasing pool of talent in different sports, we will not win the number of medals that we once did. Competition is getting harder, because every other country is catching up.

I welcome the document, which is a comprehensive statement of what needs to be done. I wish that there were a couple of extra noughts on the figure of £75 million for the development of primary school facilities, but it is a good document that sets out a strategy for the future. If it can be delivered, it will leave a lasting legacy in this country, and a better future for our sport.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Minister has permission to speak again.

5.17 pm

Kate Hoey: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker. I shall be as brief as possible. I hope that you have enjoyed the debate, which has been a great advertising campaign for various sports. It has been a most interesting way to spend the afternoon of election day. I welcome the contributions of all hon. Members. Of course the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) must argue, from an Opposition point of view, that the Government are not going far enough or not doing things in the right way. However, he and the hon. Member for Colchester (Mr. Russell), who speaks on behalf of the Liberal Democrats, accept that the Government's strategy is broadly right. That is important, and I welcome their praise for the document.

Hon. Members have made useful contributions to the debate. In my long speech, I did not and could not mention everything. I welcome the comments that have been made about amateur sports clubs, tax exemptions and rate relief, which need to be addressed. The hon. Member for Ryedale accepted that the previous Government found it difficult to move on that issue, too. The problem unites sport, and Lord Phillips has recently worked closely with the Central Council of Physical Recreation and other organisations to discover a way to make progress on it. I am keen to listen to what people are saying and find a way of taking the issue forward, because the role of amateur sports clubs is crucial. There are so many things that would not cost huge amounts of money but would make a real difference to those small clubs.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Dr. Stoate) both on his marathon run and on the way in which he brought his medical expertise to the debate. He talked about the importance of a healthy life style, picking up on what other hon. Members said about the way in which young people's life styles are changing. We cannot dictate to young people on that issue or change them overnight, but we should be aware of the fact that they have so many more choices than we had.

I am aware of the problems suffered by rural areas that were mentioned by the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Breed). When we talk about deprivation, there is a tendency to assume that we are referring to the inner-city areas. Rural deprivation is different. My hon. Friend the Member for Loughborough (Mr. Reed) mentioned the problems that pupils in small primary schools have in forming teams, but rural areas have other problems. The whole question of funding going to schools with the community use proviso is made more difficult if people have to travel a long way to take advantage of that community use, so we need to be flexible on that.

We will never completely take the risk out of sport and we would not want to, but the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall is right to refer to the problems raised by the growing litigation. That is a cost factor in sport that did not exist a few years ago.

[Kate Hoey]

My hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Thomas) reminded us of the economic benefits of sport and the benefits of private sector involvement. Sport does not merely provide a recreational purpose—it provides jobs, too. He also mentioned canoeists, who are not mentioned in the Countryside and Rights of Way Bill, and from whom I have received a number of letters on that score. Canoeing is not the only issue in that category; there are several other instances of sport in conflict with the use of land and water. For example, anglers have strong views about canoeists. People who go water-skiing and do motor sports on Lake Windermere have recently been outraged by the decision from the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions that the lake should not be used for those sports. Clearly, those dilemmas will always exist and the Government are not always best placed to sort them out. The sports world itself must sometimes take those difficult decisions.

My hon. Friend the Member for Feltham and Heston (Mr. Keen) made a thoughtful speech in which he reminded us, in his own personal way, of how much sport can mean to young people and the difference it makes to their lives. He also talked about his great interest in sport for veterans. I was pleased to be at the veterans' championships, where there were some amazing performances. I found it an inspiration to see how those people had kept up their interest in sport.

I give the members of the all-party parliamentary football club my best wishes for their game at the Stadium of Light on Monday. They are lucky that the game is not on Tuesday, because they would not have been allowed to go.

Before I go on to the points made by the hon. Member for Ryedale, I will deal with the comments of the hon. Member for Colchester. I thank him for his support. Many of his comments show why we need the strategy. We need to bring people together. I broadly agree with everything that he said about the need for curriculum time to be guaranteed. However, the school day is increasingly no longer 9 to 3 or 3.30. What happens after school is—or should be, if the school is part of the community—part of the school day in the wider sense.

I discussed performance pay with the Office for Standards in Education and the Department for Education and Employment. Physical education teachers must be entitled to performance pay, because they do so much extra in addition to what is required. I shall not discuss whether I advocate a dedicated sports ministry, although I am often asked. An awful lot can be achieved under existing arrangements, and there is no point in spending months and years implementing different changes. Responsibility for sport has moved a great deal among Departments over the years, and we now need to deal with it.

Minority sports are crucial. It is a matter of debate whether to give a little money to all sports, to give more money to a few sports that are likely to win medals, or merely to allow the best people in the country to represent their country abroad, even if they will not win. Sport itself, along with the United Kingdom Sports Institute, must help decide the priorities in the debate about world-class performers. I shall re-examine the case of Robin Knight; I recall the question, but cannot remember my answer. However, I am sure that the hon. Member for Colchester has a copy of it.

The hon. Member for Ryedale made a huge number of points, and mentioned amateur sports clubs. I am pleased that we have his support and look forward to receiving the report from York. I shall not discuss Wembley, on which we have spent a great deal of time over the past six months. I do not believe that the hon. Member for Ryedale would expect the Secretary of State or me to be involved in the planning decision between the developer of Wembley national stadium and Brent council. We await the outcome of those discussions, which have been continuing for some time.

National lottery funding and the new opportunities fund are not being used for purposes for which lottery money should not be used. The new opportunities fund will be used to cover the extra expenses of, for example, sports equipment, coaching sessions and sports days, which would not be incurred without school sports co-ordinators. I do not believe that the hon. Member for Ryedale is suggesting that we pull the plug on healthy living centres and after-school work. I am keen for sport to receive its share of available resources by arguing its case.

The hon. Member for Ryedale mentioned Pickett's Lock. Much work remains to be done and I welcome his support. I shall keep him as well informed as possible. We shall keep a close watch on the matter. I am determined that it should not be subject to the procedural wrangling to which Wembley has been subject. I shall write to him with the details. The issue of the £75 million and the 20 per cent. threshold is complicated. Part of the role of the implementation group will be to raise such questions and ask for answers. The amount of money in the pot is limited and we must make it go as far as possible. I shall ensure that I write to hon. Members with the answers to any other questions that I have not formally answered.

I assure all hon. Members that no one was more delighted than me with the launch of the sports strategy. It was not put together overnight. It involved many people and much cross-departmental work, and sometimes felt like having a tooth pulled. However, now that it has been launched, the hard work to implement it begins. I look forward to working with all hon. Members present from all parties to implement the strategy and to give this country a sporting future of which we can all be proud.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-nine minutes past Five o'clock.

Tuesday 9 May 2000

[SIR ALAN HASELHURST in the Chair]

Law and Order

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Robert Ainsworth.]

10 am

Mrs. Gillian Shephard (South-West Norfolk): I am very grateful to have secured this debate on a matter greatly exercising the minds of rural communities. The House—indeed, the whole country—knows that the issues raised by Mr. Tony Martin's trial have touched a nerve in the nation's consciousness. During the nine months since the incident, I have not commented on the crime, the trial or the outcome of the trial. Mr. Martin is to appeal, so the matter is again sub judice, and I do not intend to break my self-imposed embargo.

Although I am concerned about the impact of the episode on the people of South-West Norfolk, especially those who live closest to Mr. Martin's property in the village of Emneth, I am even more concerned about what the incident has revealed about the state of policing in rural areas and people's attitudes to the police's ability to protect them and their property.

We should not forget that rural communities are collections not only of individuals, but of businesses, including agriculture. In its journal this month, the National Farmers Union makes its concerns clear. The latest NFU Mutual figures show that rural theft costs the farming industry more than £93 million a year, and the journal states:

> The Government must act now to deliver adequate policing and security for people living and working in the countryside.

I feel sure that the Minister will have seen that journal, as it is in front of him.

The NFU's president, Mr. Ben Gill, comments:

> There is a growing feeling of helplessness in rural communities—stemming from the inability of the legal system to deliver successful prosecutions.

In a letter dated 2 May to my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall), the Country Landowners Association draws attention to the report, "The State of the Countryside 2000", published on 26 April by the Countryside Agency. That report says that some crime, such as vehicle crime, has been rising faster in rural areas than in urban areas. The letter says:

> The countryside may still be a safer place to live, on the law of probabilities, but the Tony Martin case, supported by others, demonstrates that if the police are not in a position to respond fast to calls, or to give people the protection they need, then in an isolated rural situation the mere existence of a police force ceases to give people the confidence they need in the battle against crime.
> Furthermore, the increased mobility of criminals between rural areas, and from urban to rural areas, means that traditional levels of policing in rural areas are no longer sufficient to tackle criminals who can be sixty miles away before a burglary call is investigated.

The Minister will know, because I have raised the matter several times in the House and in correspondence with him, that I urge him to act on the recommendations of the report on policing in rural areas that his Department commissioned a year ago. He or his colleagues will have discussed with the chairmen of the 11 most rural police authorities the findings of that report, which would give Norfolk an additional £2.4 million for extra police on the beat.

In a letter to me dated 28 April, the chairman of the Norfolk police authority, Mr. Jim Wilson—recently appointed—makes his point with some force. He says:

> It should be remembered that Norfolk, despite being a growth county, territorially one of the largest, and an area which attracts thousands of holidaymakers every year, is at the bottom of the pile as far as police-to-population ratios are concerned. Norfolk bid for 90 further officers in the recent Home Office 'challenge funding' but we were only allocated 66 over a three-year period, now possibly reduced to two years. Since 1997 total officer strength has fallen by 50.

Mr. Wilson also describes the further pressures on Norfolk's existing police budget. He points out that the authority is expected to sign up, apparently, for a period of 19 years to the new national communications service for the police, which seems odd in a field as rapidly changing as communications technology. The Minister may like to comment on that, if he can, although it could be a misunderstanding on Mr. Wilson's part. That will cost the force £3 million in capital and up to £630,000 a year in revenue. He adds:

> We in Norfolk are uncertain at this stage that we can afford the necessary menu options; if we cannot it will impact on our ability to deliver an enhanced front-line service.

When we had the opportunity to debate some of those issues last week in the excellent Adjournment debate on police numbers that was initiated by my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge, I said that modernisation and up-to-date technology were clearly essential to combat equally up-to-date criminal activity. However, that should not be at the expense of other priorities and, at the very least, should not render front-line policing less effective, as Mr. Wilson implies would be the effect of the current strategy.

Mr. Wilson goes on to point out that the increased bureaucracy and paperwork imposed on the police by best value legislation and the requirement over the past two years to implement annual 2 per cent. efficiency plans across all forces—irrespective of their capability to make such annual savings—will be time-consuming and expensive. He uses a worrying phrase in that he describes that activity as:

> another diversion from what the public would recognise as the real purpose of policing.

Those are the words of the chairman of the Norfolk police authority. I hope that the Minister can comment on that point, which comes from the coal face. Clearly, he would agree that any diversion from the real purpose of policing should be avoided.

I also hope that the Minister can expand on his interesting comment in last week's Adjournment debate that he is seriously considering the problems posed by the funding of pension payments. Of course, I realise that that is not a new problem, but one that has grown over the years. However, such payments currently absorb 15 per cent. of the revenue budget of the Norfolk police authority, according to its chairman.

Police morale is affected by those factors and by the criticism that the police feel that they have suffered as a result of a number of high-profile cases, including that of Tony Martin. In Norfolk, the police have achieved two extremely high-profile successes in terms of an arrest and charge in one high-profile murder case and a conviction in another case. In the many hundreds of letters that I have received about the Martin case and the issues that it raises, the legal system is criticised at least as much as the police. The Minister will be aware of that.

However, there are police operational matters uncovered by the case and frequently spoken of, for which the Minister is not responsible, but of which he needs to be aware. I think that such matters exasperate local police on the beat as much as they do the public. Many of those matters were raised last week at a meeting of the Swaffham chamber of trade in my constituency, attended by a police inspector, a sergeant and a constable. The Minister might like to note that the chamber presented the constable with a mobile phone, so that he could be contacted at all times. The Minister will doubtless say that that is a good example of community police partnership. [Laughter.] So it is, but he will also accept that it shows that the chamber of trade feels that it is sometimes difficult to get anyone on the beat. I certainly do not decry the generosity of the chamber of trade, which was well meant, or its relationship with the local police, but I should like the Minister to reflect for a moment on where we now are.

It was pointed out at that meeting that, in the past two and half years, 50 per cent. of the constables, an inspector and two sergeants had been lost because of reduced funds. Poor-quality police cars with high mileages on the clock did not help. Response times to calls for help, the routeing of 999 calls to a central point in Norwich where the staff did not know the location of villages across the county and computer problems were raised at the meeting by local business people who were anxious about what they see as escalating security risks for them and their businesses. Those are clearly not simply matters of resources, although some of them are resource related. That is the view not only of the public, but of the police.

Mr. David Prior (North Norfolk): My right hon. Friend will know the market town of North Walsham in my constituency. I believe that she was born there, or at least went to school there. I met a great number of people in North Walsham last week who told me that they were frightened to go out at night. That would also be true of towns like Swaffham in her constituency and Fakenham in mine. There is a feeling that there are simply not enough policemen visible on the beat to protect people. It is the fear of crime, rather than levels of crime, that is important in rural areas.

Mrs. Shephard: There is no simple correlation between the number of police on the beat and the reduction of crime: I know that the Minister will tell us that at the end of the debate, because I have heard him say it many times. But there is a clear correlation between people's attitude as to whether they are at risk and the number of policemen that they see. Indeed, it is connected to my next point, which has been my constant theme during the past nine months while the Tony Martin case has dominated the headlines. If people feel that the police lack the resources to protect them and their property—my earlier remarks illustrate the fact that the police share that view—they will be tempted to take the law into their own hands. The consequences of that have been all too tragically demonstrated by the outcome of the Martin case.

Mr. Lovell of Tipps End in my constituency puts the matter succinctly in his letter to me of 24 April. He says:

> Rather than make householders more fearful about tackling burglars, the case has hardened many people's views. I have heard it for myself. This is a very worrying trend, and unless something radical is done, the situation, I fear, will get worse. There is now talk of vigilante groups armed with illegal weapons and a total feeling of disgust and frustration directed towards the police and legal system. Those of us who believe in the rule of law are very concerned about the mood of the community.

A letter from a farmer states:

> In the rural areas the police presence is now non-existent. The criminals know this. We regularly suffer minor thefts and the police are too over-stretched and lacking in manpower to investigate them satisfactorily. When they are called to the scene of a crime they take, on average, 25 minutes to arrive, their excuse being that, even with grid references and postcode etc., they are still not able to locate us. Is it surprising that some are beginning to take the law into their own hands?

I have received letters on this subject from all over the country. Mr. Derek Bromwich from Greenford in Middlesex takes the point further. He asks:

> Why have police numbers fallen so dramatically over recent years? Has it more to do with political correctness and disillusionment with the criminal justice system...? Will you politicians—the Minister will enjoy this—

> who live in relative luxury with high security and personal bodyguards just get real and deal with this problem. Otherwise we have no option but to take the law into our own hands. We are just not safe either in the city or the country and don't insult our intelligence by quoting bogus, inaccurate and manipulated crime statistics to pretend crime is going down. We live in the real world and we are not all stupid.

The Minister is bound to be aware of the current strength of feeling about law and order in this country. He occupies a hot seat, which would not be made more comfortable by reading the survey in the previous issue of the Fenland Citizen. Its readership was asked to telephone in with answers to questions about the Tony Martin case, one of which was, "Do you feel safe in your own home?" A staggering 91 per cent. of the more than 1,000 people who rang in replied that they did not.

The police are aware of these attitudes, which does not make their job any easier, especially when they feel under-resourced. All hon. Members will have heard from their constituents anecdotal evidence of the police arriving hours after an incident or, even worse, not arriving at all. At the Swaffham chamber of trade meeting in my constituency last week, a shopkeeper in the town, Mrs. Carol Baker, described arriving at her shop at 7.30 in the morning to find that it had been burgled. She reported the crime to the Norfolk police central switchboard at 7.45, was told that no one could attend the crime and was given a crime number for her insurance claim. It was 36 hours before any police officer attended; and five whole days later, the local police had still not been informed about her problem because it had been communicated to a computer. The exasperation of the local police can only be imagined: they would have been as infuriated as she was. Her confidence in the ability of the police to help her took a severe bruising.

People have written from all over Britain. Many of them took the trouble to say that they were not members of my political party. Much of what they said was about Tony Martin's trial, the verdict and the sentence; but many also commented on how they felt about the current performance of the police. The most important issue raised by the case is that people feel that police numbers are so thinly stretched that they cannot protect individuals' property.

Since the Government came to power, police numbers have fallen by 2,300. The number of civilian staff has remained the same and the number of specials has fallen by 3,500. Worse, the Norfolk police authority chairman has made it clear that the new communications system will demand extra money and the Government's own requirements for police bureaucracy are eating further into police time—a

as Mr. Wilson put it. The consequent inability of the police to respond as they would wish to calls for help from the public is beginning to diminish public respect for them, through no fault of their own. Their own morale is suffering.

The solution is at least partly in the Government's hands. Some problems are not new, but others—the reduction in police numbers, the increase in bureaucracy and paperwork and the lack of interest in rural communities—are of the Government's own making. Rural people and their problems matter too. They deserve some priority of treatment. I cannot believe that the Minister will stand by and watch respect for the law crumble, partly as a result of reduced resources.

The Minister has taken the trouble to listen to concerns, many of which have been voiced in his own predominantly rural county. He has promised to examine the issues carefully in the run up to the publication of the rural White Paper and the comprehensive spending review that is being prepared for later in the summer. I ask him to persuade his colleagues in the Government to reconsider the Government's spending and attention priorities, to reflect on what is happening in rural communities and to understand that the issue is much more than simply a matter of resources—it is about respect for the law and taking action before it is too late.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): I am delighted to be able to take part in the debate. Because of Select Committee duties I was unable to attend last week's debate on police numbers, but I am sure that some of the issues that the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard) mentioned were highlighted. I have, however, spoken in both the debates on police grants that have been held in recent years, so I hope that I have shown an interest. My hon. Friend the Minister will also know about the meetings that we have had.

It is important to put the record straight. I hold the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk in high esteem—we worked together on the Select Committee on Modernisation of the House of Commons and still bear the scars—but I was disappointed when she said that the Labour party did not care about rural areas. Labour Members do not pretend to have a new feel for rural issues but have worked relentlessly over many years to highlight them. Such issues have not appeared on the political antennae only recently, but date back decades.

I do not want to trade newspaper cuttings with the right hon. Lady, but the headline story in my local weekly newspaper last week said that the village bobby and station were about to be axed and taken away from the good denizens of Minchinhampton, which is a fairly large village in the Cotswolds, in my constituency. The newspaper announced that the police constable, Jim Gregory, whom I know well and who has been an excellent bobby over the years, is about to be moved to rural protection duties. I hope that that will be a good way for him to see out his later years in the police force but the change leaves the authority with a dilemma over his replacement. Jim lives in the police house in Minchinhampton and operates the police station next door, and I should make it clear that I do not want to push him out of his house, because he wants to see out his years there. However, Cheryl Thomas, the inspector for the area in which I live, has said that the police authority will not seek a replacement for Jim, and I want to tease out that dilemma.

We must replace the Jim Gregorys of this world, but we cannot do so by putting officers into the various communities, because there are other pressures and policing has moved on. That dilemma, which I have faced several times, relates to the visibility and accessibility of the police. Those issues are important in rural areas; if people do not see their police, they lose confidence and feel that they are unpoliced. At the same time, that approach to policing is not, in the main, the way to catch criminals. The dilemma that we face is how to balance visibility and accessibility with the effectiveness of the police force.

I am carrying on a funny sort of dialogue, because I have not talked to my police authority and the police about how they reached their decision. However, by pure chance, a police consultative committee meeting is taking place in Minchinhampton tomorrow night, and I imagine that it will be well attended. Inspector Cheryl Thomas announced the news about Jim Gregory at a parish council meeting last week.

I would like assurances from the police that they will give the area a named officer, as they have done elsewhere. Whitminster, which is also in my constituency, lost its police station 18 months ago, and WPC Debbie Lord was allocated as its named officer. That seems to have worked reasonably well. It is important for someone, in co-operation with other agencies, to have responsibility for an area, even if, as with Jim Gregory, his operational duties occasionally pull him away from the community. That has long been the case, but it is more the case now. It is important to have a mobile police force, which can do what we need it to do.

Just before Christmas, I was part of a delegation to my hon. Friend the Minister, which included the chief constable for Gloucestershire, Tony Butler; the chairman of the police authority, Brigadier Michael Browne; and the chief officer of the county council, Richard Cockcroft. The hon. Member for Cheltenham (Mr. Jones) was also a member of the delegation. Members of the public who say that Members of Parliament have a well-protected, easy life should remember what some people go through. Understandably, people sometimes have short memories, but they should be reminded of the tragic events in Cheltenham, which bring home to us the risks taken by anyone in the public service.

The key points raised by the delegation may have had some impact, as the Minister has spoken about those matters on more than one occasion, and we are gratified by what he said. We made an early bid for what are known colloquially as Jack Straw bobbies. I would not say that Gloucestershire got its fair share, as we never get—well, never argue that we get—a completely fair share, but police numbers have been increased, which is most welcome. We bid to ensure that when those officers have been trained there will be a rural dimension to their allocation. We stressed the importance of the sparsity factor as a way of considering how the correct formula is decided, and emphasised that the distribution of police numbers should take account of the mobile criminal fraternity.

My county faces the problem of criminals coming from Bristol and Birmingham, and that has begun to hit rural areas. Constituents and members of the public sometimes allege that the number of offences is up when in reality it is not, unless someone is doing something strange. There are always arguments about how the figures are counted and how crime is recorded, but whenever I ask the police, there is a decline in the number of crimes. However, it needs only one event such as the Tony Martin case to bring home to all of us—

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire): I thought that the hon. Gentleman was talking about Gloucestershire. Crimes there rose by 1,932 last year—an increase of 4 per cent.

Mr. Drew: As I was saying before the hon. Gentleman intervened, it is a lot to do with how crimes are recorded. In Gloucestershire, we are trying to record crime properly and get to the root of what is happening. I shall not bandy statistics with the hon. Gentleman, but in many areas, especially rural areas, there has been a decline—although not significant—in the number of crimes. However, even if we play the statistics game, we ignore crime at our peril because what is important is how it is perceived. I entirely agree with the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk that how one perceives what is happening is very significant. I raised the matter in a previous debate on the police.

A Women's Institute survey highlighted the degree to which people fear crime and genuinely see it as the most important issue in determining their quality of life. I will not argue about statistics with the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire; crime is declining, but although the recording of crime may have improved, there is much more to do.

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North): It is rather novel for me to think about matters relating to crime, in spite of the fact that my home was burgled twice in the past six months. Although a House of Commons champagne bottle was taken, and found in the back of a car during a machete fight, the police were unable to nail the two culprits. I wonder about people's perception. What is it that people perceive when they are being burgled, mugged or raped? What sort of perception do the people have whom my hon. Friend spoke about? What are they most frightened of?

Mr. Drew: I shall try to answer my hon. Friend. They are fearful of what appears in the headlines, but their overwhelming fear is that it will happen to them. That is now just as likely to happen in rural areas as in urban centres. Like my hon. Friend, we can all cite such experiences. My office has been broken into twice recently—I suspect by the same person. The first time, he took £5. The second time, he took £2. That tells us something about Labour party offices, which seem to get poorer rather than richer. I am not sure when we can expect matters to improve.

Rural areas suffer not only from the activities of mobile criminals. In rural areas—my constituency is typical of a rural area, with market towns with a rural hinterland—members of a hard core of local criminals seem to commit the same crimes time after time. The police are frustrated because the crimes of many of those who are regularly arrested are drugs related. We need a police presence on the streets because it would give people confidence and make the criminals think twice about the daft things that they often do.

Mr. Prior: I am sorry to hear that the hon. Member for North Norfolk—

Dr. Gibson: You represent North Norfolk.

Mr. Prior: I am sorry to hear that the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) had a bottle of champagne stolen. He certainly would not have wanted to drink it last Thursday night.

Does the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) believe that it is the fact that repeat offenders continuously receive short custodial sentences that so undermines the morale of the police force?

Mr. Drew: Yes, I do. One of the Labour party's key manifesto commitments was to speed up the course of justice. That can be done in two ways. First, we must convict criminals and, when appropriate, commit them to prison. Secondly, we must have an overall approach to dealing with crime. Everyone from the chief constable and the police to the various agencies concerned welcomed the youth justice reforms that we introduced, but the improvements will not come about in a matter of months or years; they will take decades.

Until recently, many communities knew the hard-core group of local criminals; indeed, they were so notorious that they were often accused of things that they had not done. It is important to deal with them. I am not saying that the problem does not exist in urban areas, but in rural areas it is easier to pinpoint those people, because of the way in which communities still hold together, they know exactly what is going on. Until recently, my own community of Stonehouse had an amazing clear-up rate of more than 70 per cent. because certain people were always known about. Unfortunately, fractiousness there during the past five years has made that clear-up rate more difficult to achieve.

I wish to comment on what the Government have done so far and what should happen next. It is vital that the police have a presence on the streets, in which named officers are responsible for certain areas. Not only will they been seen doing their daily task, but they will be known from their visits to schools and community centres. That will build up people's confidence. We must also acknowledge that fighting crime is about being mobile. Mobility can be improved by ensuring that we have an effective police fleet and by making the other changes that we know to be necessary.

The right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk spoke about the chamber of trade in her constituency giving a mobile phone to a constable. Police in Gloucestershire might obtain better reception on mobile phones than they do on their radios. I go out with the police regularly and I have discussed these problems with them. I could be a good luck charm, as I have not seen the malaise that has been mentioned, although I know that it is real. Until recently, the police have had to keep changing their radio wavebands as they go from one side of the valley to the other and so on. These are acute problems and, although there have been arguments about the funding of the police radio project, it is crucial that it is completed as soon as possible, so that communications will be as rapid and effective as they can possibly be. I hope that the Minister will yet again reiterate that we are simply waiting for the money to be made available, and that the sparsity argument is won. We know about the associated problems, which are faced not only by farmers and other isolated rural businesses but by rural communities, especially in hamlets, where people feel very left out.

I should point out the importance of security funding—argument continues on this private matter—in these issues. If I did not throw this subject into the debate, my chief constable would say, "You made a good speech, but you failed yet again to mention that some of us feel a little bit miffed about the security issues, which have not been properly listened to in relation to the complete funding picture."

As the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk rightly said, the police pensions issue is also highly significant. Among all the other constraints under which any public service will operate, the police pensions issue is the one that is especially important for police. We must grasp that nettle. I will not say that the current Government are more responsible for this matter than were the previous one, from whom all the problems came. They created a time bomb that was obviously going to explode at some point. We know that if we do not do something about it, it will eat into the police budget. I believe that pensions account for 17 per cent. of my authority's budget, and that that figure is expected to rise to more than 20 per cent. That is an enormous top slice off money that can be used for operational work, and we must do something about it.

In conclusion, I feel that the Government have got the message, which does not relate only to funding; it is also an operational message. We must revisit some of the ways in which we allocate our police. We must also ensure an understanding that the high-profile stuff does not relate merely to a synthetic vision of policing in the past. It is important to build people's confidence, which is as important as—although not more important than—the way in which we use all the different means that are available of fighting crime more effectively.

Dr. George Turner (North-West Norfolk): I start by congratulating the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard) on the generally tempered and measured way in which she spoke about problems that, I suspect, have featured in my mailbag as much as in hers during the past several months. However, I hope that I may gently chide her, as I would like to have heard some words of apology for the fact that when she and her party had the opportunity to do more about the issues that she mentioned, they did nothing.

Mrs. Shephard: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman does not dispute the fact that police numbers have fallen under the current Government by 50 in Norfolk and by 2,300 in total.

Dr. Turner: I shall come to that point. I know that the right hon. Lady was not present last week, and I intend to briefly summarise, but not repeat, one or two points about that issue.

As a member of the Norfolk county council, which was responsible for the police budget for many years, and having been a member of the authority for a number of years, I know that we are discussing long-standing problems. I am pleased that they are being highlighted, as by emphasising them we can more quickly and firmly ensure that the Government address them. The problems of rural crime are not new and hon. Members who were in the previous Government should recognise that they provided the incoming Government with a poor heritage with respect to the resourcing of the police in Norfolk. I visited police stations throughout the county over the years and could have despaired about the resources—the lack of IT and good communications and, for most of those years, an argument about police numbers.

I suppose that it is the job of the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk to criticise, but it is particularly inappropriate to say that the Government do not care about rural areas. It was because I represent one of the most rural seats in England that the Home Secretary went, on his first major expedition to East Anglia, not to Norwich but to King's Lynn. He told me that. He went there because he knew that I would be able to invite representatives from 60-plus parishes to meet him. As I reminded the House last week, he was chided by people with their bums firmly on seats in London about the pleasures of being in King's Lynn on a wet Friday night, when 600 people turned up to hear him and to give him their views on rural crime. The Minister, my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Clarke), came to the county earlier this year.

I know, from correspondence and discussion, that the Government do care about rural crime. However, I understand—and because I do I shall continue to press the Government about this matter—that there are many demands on resources. We shall have to continue, as the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk did, to keep the issue before Government if we are to have a fair share of the resources. It is to the Government's credit that they commissioned a report to investigate the validity of rural areas' claims that they were under-resourced to an unfair degree. Almost every Member of Parliament says that the police in their constituency are under-resourced, but it is claimed that rural areas are unfairly under-resourced because previous Governments did not take into account the problems of sparsity.

I spoke about those challenges last week and do not want to cover them again, but they are problems for those who must police a large area, particularly when, as in my constituency, most crime is committed in the smaller, urban part of it. There are hundreds of square miles to cover, but much police effort is tied up by the crime in a small area, and that makes policing difficult. There are vehicle problems and Norfolk has difficulties in keeping 46 stations—one of the highest numbers in the country—open to the public.

Dr. Gibson: Will my hon. Friend also accentuate the positive with respect to the Norfolk police force? Will he mention their work with DNA technology and the marvellous way that they have solved crimes with the use of modern technology in the past few years? They have grasped the nettle and are leading the way in many of the new technologies. We should sing about that.

Dr. Turner: My hon. Friend does me a favour by mentioning the next issue that I wanted to raise. The matter was brought home when, last week, the debate was summarised as being about police numbers. I regret that I gave that impression because one of the key points that I wanted to make in the debate was that one can overemphasise the import of a number. The fact that modern technology provides the police with tools to increase their effectiveness has led the Norfolk police authority to divert resources. Lower police numbers are due not to lower funding, but to the fact that the local police authority and the chief constable have been trying to achieve better results with the resources.

We must understand that just raising police numbers is not the right way to help the public. We have to ensure that the public understand this argument. The new crime detection methods—and IT, which relieves the burden of paperwork and bureaucracy and provides clues, not because computers are more intelligent, but simply because of their greater crunching power—both free police time. We could divert the money needed for those to pay to have people parading up and down the streets although that would have less effect. The police authority is to be congratulated on facing up to that problem.

The Opposition will not help the debate if they continue to take a blinkered view. I accept the statement by the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk that she does not want extra police numbers at the expense of technology. In a non-ideal world, the police and the police authority must balance these demands. We should give them our support and not criticise them if they choose not to adopt the sole measure of increasing police numbers.

Fear of crime in recent months has probably been a more important issue than crime itself. This situation reminds me of my mother. If my mother, a marvellous hypochondriac in her time, were asked several times whether she had a particular symptom, she could almost imagine that she had. One cause of the fear of crime is the asking of questions about it. If people are repeatedly asked, "Are you frightened to leave your home tonight? Are you frightened when you go down that dark lane without any street lighting to get to the local pub? Are you frightened by what has happened in Norfolk recently?" the result will be a heightened fear of crime. We must assess the public's view and take it on board, but we must also be careful that we reassure people. Rural crime has always existed. There has always been, and still is, less of it than in urban areas. Whatever our individual experience of crime, most of us for the most part are under no threat from the crime that we really fear—violent crime. The fear of violent crime is the greatest fear at present in West Norfolk.

While trying to discover whether my views are based on facts, I have had the opportunity to discuss the issue with senior police officers and officers on the beat. Yesterday, in preparation for the debate, I met the newly appointed chief superintendent for the division covering west Norfolk, Mr. Mike McCormack. The leaders and deputy leaders of the King's Lynn and West Norfolk borough council also attended the meeting, which made it more useful. The borough council is one of the key partners in the new crime and disorder partnership—the Safer West Norfolk steering group—which is taking forward the Government's proposals for closer working. We discussed the report on the first year of the partnership, which was recently submitted to the Minister. The meeting was helpful, and I hope that a formal meeting on the issues later in the summer will receive good publicity because it will reassure the public.

The participants at the meeting reminded me that, in addition to the beat base in Terrington St. John, which I mentioned last week, a beat office has been established in Great Massingham, in another part of my constituency. Although there have been teething problems in terms of the extent to which the office is used, its establishment shows how, when a parish council works with the borough council and the police, the available resources and police efficiency can be maximised.

I want to press the Minister on something that the Government should be doing now. Last week, the Minister promised me that the Home Secretary was working hard to ensure that rural policing received a fairer share of the nation's resources in the spending review for 2000, due to be announced in July. I do not expect to hear much more than a repeat of that promise in terms of the broader picture. Would the Minister be willing to consider whether there was a significant opportunity, especially given the publicity, to study a package of rural measures for the fens? A part of the area is in the constituency of the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk, a part is in Cambridgeshire and a part is in Lincolnshire. Specific problems there could be addressed.

All those with responsibility for crime and disorder matters should consider whether more could be done in the way of property marking, home and farm watches and, in particular, the improvement of intelligence. Complaints are made about telephone calls taken centrally from remote areas. Rural intelligence officers might be appropriate, perhaps acting across county boundaries. They could serve a particular patch so that local telephone messages could by taken by people based locally, passing them to local police. I understand that we do not have a mobile closed-circuit television system because we are awaiting the outcomes of trials elsewhere in the country. I say to my hon. Friend the Minister that urgency on the matter would be helpful.

In closing, I hope that, even ahead of decisions to come later in the year, the Minister will be willing to consider some of the suggestions positively. I know from my discussions in Norfolk yesterday that the borough council and the local police would support such a rural package.

10.52 am

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire): I apologise for turning up late for the debate. I had a misunderstanding with a horse at the weekend involving gravity and had to see the doctor.

Mr. Drew: The incident did not involve the hon. Gentleman's head?

Mr. Paterson: Hon. Members will be glad to hear that the diagnosis was entirely trivial.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard) on bringing this important matter to the attention of the House. I come from a rural area. If I dared to break the Norfolk monopoly on the debate, I would further congratulate my right hon. Friend on being part of a Government who increased the number of police officers in the West Mercia area by 405 during her time in office.

I would like to address the problem of police numbers in the West Mercia police area. The Minister received a delegation of West Mercia Members in January, led by my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill). The Minister will therefore know that West Mercia police is easily the worst off of all shire police authorities, receiving £103,127. Dare I mention that Norfolk receives £109,000 and that Cleveland receives £152,495? There is no doubt that West Mercia has the lowest expenditure per thousand of the population. The figures for central Government grant per head of resident population for West Mercia are striking when compared with those for surrounding police authorities. In West Mercia, the sum is £84.63; it is £92.38 in the area covered by the Dyfed-Powys police, £134.30 in that covered by the West Midlands police and £93.60 in the Staffordshire police area.

I could continue at length. I have given the Minister the figures. I stress that West Mercia is one of the largest areas. We have 2,866 square miles and just one police officer per 1,078 members of the population. That is about the lowest ratio in western Europe. As the North Shropshire Neighbourhood and Farm Watch Association asked,

> Is it not about time that residents of the three counties forming West Mercia, who all pay the same rate of income taxes as the rest of the country, had a far better deal out of this Home Secretary and the Home Office?

When we saw the Minister, we were told to hang our hats on the crimefighting fund. We have already lost 78 policemen in West Mercia since the election. There was great disappointment when, of the 36 new posts applied for, only 18 were granted, so we are 60 policemen short—despite the fact that the Government acknowledged that there are problems in delivering policing in rural areas and commissioned ORH Ltd. to report on the cost created by the extra travel times and communications difficulties and the need for extra police stations. The report recommended that the sparsity factor in rural areas be taken into account.

I hope that the Minister will respond to that issue. Why did the Government commission that report from an independent company and then stick it in a drawer? Why have the Government not acknowledged the report's recommendations, which would have given West Mercia £2.3 million extra? There is a real danger that the contract between the citizen and the state—whereby the citizen pays his taxes and hands over responsibility to the state to maintain law and order—may be breaking down.

Following the high-profile debates that took place after the incident in Norfolk, I went to Oswestry market last week. As I went around the town, I was astonished to learn how many people's houses or shops had been broken into. I was also astonished to discover that many people had not reported the incidents to the police and, importantly, that they had threatened intruders with weapons. That is extremely worrying. There is a danger that, unless the developing vacuum is dealt with, people will begin to take the law into their own hands, either through vigilantism, which has already been mentioned, or by employing private agencies. I have addressed councils on that issue, and they all say that they would like more policemen. However, there are 98 villages in my constituency, and it is highly unlikely that, with any Government, there will be adequate policemen to cover them.

I want to make one suggestion; parish councils should be allowed to finance security men out of their precept. That has already been done in St. Martins, an ex-mining village that has experienced law and order problems. In that village, where an ex-policeman was employed and put in a smart uniform, a considerable amount of trivial, tiresome street crime disappeared because there was someone on the spot who knew the locals, could spot strange cars or ne'er-do-wells coming into the village and could keep in close contact with the police. The system worked extremely well but, for reasons that I shall not go into, it was stopped, and West Mercia has employed a community policeman, who is based in a supermarket in the village. However, there is real merit in considering the use of security men, funded by parish councils, who can liaise closely with the police—an idea that is supported by the senior policemen to whom I have spoken. I should be interested to hear the Minister's reaction to that.

Mr. Colin Breed (South-East Cornwall): I believe that there is a large measure of agreement between members of all parties who represent rural areas. Rural crime certainly is not new, but perhaps it is now being highlighted and it is increasing—partly, I suspect, due to the population shift. More people are moving into rural areas, so it may not be surprising that there is an increase in rural crime.

I suspect that most people and most parish councils want, not more policemen, but less crime, but they imagine that by having more policemen, there might be less crime. There is no doubt that the police are stretched and are being stretched further. The sparsity factor has been mentioned, and I hope that the Government will recognise the need to do something about it because it is clearly affecting the ability of the police to provide the sort of service that they want to provide in rural areas.

Those hon. Members who represent holiday locations will be aware of the problem of the seasonal increase in crime due to tourism. We enjoy the benefits of tourism, but it means that the police are stretched even further, and, with the inevitable traffic jams, response times become even worse, which does not make it easier for the police to attend incidents.

I suspect that every hon. Member who has visited a police station and spoken to policemen recently would confirm that one of their biggest moans is about the amount of paperwork that they have to do. I am unsure whether that problem has been tackled vigorously enough in recent times.

My part of the world, the south-west, has also seen the confluence of some unusual happenings. Two lengthy murder inquiries are under way, and have absorbed an enormous amount of police time and money. When unusual events happen together and resources are already stretched, that can make life exceptionally difficult.

I, too, have heard representatives of towns suggest that they may contract private security firms, but, as a former local councillor, I must say that that is slippery slope. Why should people have to pay additional council tax on top of other taxes in order to provide additional policing support? I can understand why councils in some areas believe that that is the right approach, partly because major problems are experienced at certain hotspot times and in certain hotspot places. Many of the problems experienced in our towns and villages occur exclusively on Friday and Saturday nights at certain locations, which most people could readily guess. It is more difficult to police at particular times in particular places: half a dozen towns may all experience Friday and Saturday night problems. Town and parish councils feel that if they could only have extra support for five or six hours at certain times of the week, they could protect the premises, the flowerbeds, the toilets and so on, which are often the target of vandalism at night.

May I offer several suggestions for the Minister to consider? First, Devon and Cornwall has the largest special constabulary and it certainly does a tremendous job. However, the time has come to reflect on how it operates and functions on a voluntary basis. It may be time to place the special constabulary on a more retained basis, as with many of the fire brigades in the south-west, so that chief constables may direct people when and where they are most needed and gain real value for money out of the training costs. I realise that the whole basis would be changed and that arguments about the merits of a two-tier force would be raised, but the special constabulary provides a means of improving community policing.

Secondly, the centralising of control rooms initially caused problems. It has improved, but many control rooms remain remote, particularly in rural areas where addresses are not complete. Some villages share the same name and there is an inordinate number of houses and farms with the same name—and a postcode is seldom provided. An experiment with the Post Office is taking place in my constituency because there is a raft of people with the wrong postcode. Satellite references are being examined. Satellite navigation is becoming prevalent in many areas, so we could consider giving proper reference points to remote locations to enable the police to attend such places without having to drive around the countryside looking for lights, balloons on posts or white towels on gates.

Thirdly, we should look further into Crimestoppers, which has already been successful and could be developed further. My hon. Friend the Member for Colchester (Mr. Russell) has obtained an Adjournment debate tonight on that very subject, so I hope that it will tease out further ways of supporting Crimestoppers.

Fourthly, planning is important. We must try to introduce into the planning system some of the defensive schemes that have been developed for older people's housing. Much of the fear about which we hear is undoubtedly related to the rowdyism and vandalism that occur around people's homes. We could look into that. I should also like wardens to be employed for older persons' establishments once more. The movement to electronic alarms has not helped to give people a feeling of security. I realise that that option was chosen for all sorts of budgetary reasons, but I believe that the physical presence of wardens on older persons' developments is far more reassuring than electronic alarms.

Some businesses invest significant moneys in crime prevention on their premises—the electronic tagging of goods, CCTV cameras and so on—only to find that, when they have caught people trying to leave their premises with their ill-gotten gains, the police decide not to prosecute, perhaps because the value is too trivial, or perhaps too high. Business people almost feel that there is little value in investing in security equipment. The police often give little thought to prosecuting offenders. They need to respond more positively to people who invest their money in security systems.

The hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) mentioned radio communications, as I intended to do. I do not know what the cost will be. However, we know that a certain windfall of £22 billion has come to the Government's coffers by way of the sales of mobile telephone licences, and I suspect that only a small fraction of that amount would be required to cover the cost of communications by radio. There is a certain synergy between the aspects of mobile telephone promotion and the upgrading of the police radio system.

Finally, the subject of access at night is being considered in the Countryside and Rights of Way Bill that is now passing through the House. The Government should consider that carefully. Many people who live in the countryside are worried about people's reasons for wanting access to land and around properties at night. They fear that it might not be for their general enjoyment alone but for other purposes. I hope that, even at this late stage, the Government will reconsider that provision.

Like every hon. Member present, I want the police to be given greater resources—as do the general public. Whether resources go into physical bodies or to other purposes, people must be confident that their fears are being addressed, that crimes that they have experienced are being tackled and that the police have the resources that they need to reduce crime and the fear of it.

11.8 am

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire): We have had an excellent debate. I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard) on securing it, and on the firm and reasoned stand that she has taken on rural crime. Many people throughout the country appreciate what she is doing, which is why so many of them have written to her expressing their deeply felt concerns.

We have heard a range of speeches; I shall comment on some of them. The final point that the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Breed) raised was about access to the countryside at night. He may remember that the former Prime Minister, my right hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major), writing in The Field, pointed out that the right to roam could in certain circumstances become a charter for rural crime, reminding us of how many people's houses or gardens backed on to open land on village edges. That makes the point that at night, access to the countryside—a fine ideal—can have particular dangers in rural areas.

I pay tribute to the police for their work. Their job is not easy, and they show tremendous bravery and courage on occasions. The police also give us a great deal of reassurance. Obviously, criticisms can be made and must be answered, but it should never be thought that we do not support the police in their work.

Yesterday's crime figures bring into focus the worrying background to the debate. The figures cover the full calendar year up to the end of 1999, when crime levels rose for the first time in six years. The statistics also show that the rise in recorded crime is gathering pace. The situation was alarming in September, and now it is worsening. For the 12 months to the end of September, crime rose by 2.2 per cent., but for the full calendar year to December, it rose by 3 per cent. The Home Secretary's so-called crusade against crime is failing.

The figures will cause concern everywhere, but especially in rural areas. It is particularly frightening to be the victim of a crime in a remote place, because neighbours are at a distance and there are concerns about the police's ability to respond. Victims feel isolated in a way that they do not in a town. The figures also confirm the anecdotal evidence that we have heard in the debate, and which has been building in the past year. In his excellent contribution, my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) explained that people in Oswestry feel that crime is increasing and that the police are not providing adequate redress.

At the royal show in Stoneleigh on 5 July 1999, it was revealed that rural crime is costing farmers and landowners more than £100 million a year. NFU Mutual said that 30,000 vehicles worth £73 million disappeared from farms and country homes last year, and that farm machinery worth £14.2 million and livestock worth £4 million were lost.

Sid Gibson of the Mutual said that he was concerned about the fact that rural crime was not falling, and he made some suggestions. Colin George, a representative of a rural security company, blamed the removal of police from villages. In late August, the Martin case occurred. David Barnard, an Upwell parish councillor, told his local paper that crime had reached crisis point in seemingly tranquil fenland villages. In Wisbech, which has the third-highest per capita crime rate in the country, the police station is now closed in the evenings.

On 3 October, the BBC report on rural crime painted a worrying picture. It surveyed 120 farmers, of whom 55 per cent. had suffered burglary in the past year, 30 per cent. had been abused, 45 per cent. had encountered vandalism and 20 per cent. had experienced arson attacks. They were frightened. In the House, we have held debates that highlighted rural concerns. My right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Norfolk pursued the issues on 19 October, and my right hon. Friend the Member for East Devon (Sir P. Emery) did so on 2 December. They both talked about the problems of rural areas and the fact that 14 police authorities had written to the Home Secretary to say that rural police authorities were disadvantaged because of insufficient recognition of the extra costs of sparsity.

Why has that happened? The hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) cited the problem in his local village, where the local police officer, Jim Gregory, will not be replaced, and the hon. Gentleman set out his concerns about that. We should not forget the background in Gloucestershire. Since the general election, funding has decreased by 3 per cent., which means 35 per cent. fewer officers, and in the past year crime has increased by 4 per cent.

The hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Dr. Turner) explained that in his constituency there were problems with the visibility of officers; he tried to make the case that the Government were not to blame, but one cannot ignore the fact that in Norfolk, police numbers are down by 50 and crime is up by 665 offences. The hon. Gentleman should accept that there is a relationship between the number of officers and increased crime. He argued that officers should be used more efficiently and should have equipment of good quality, and no one would argue with that. But one cannot get around the fact that if everything is run efficiently and there are more police officers, more criminals are caught and the public are reassured.

Dr. George Turner: Will the hon. Gentleman admit that the Government inherited a situation in which the initial support services in Norfolk were extraordinarily badly funded? It was therefore courageous of the chief constable to tackle those issues.

Mr. Heald: It is all very well to argue, "Oh well, it was all terrible then," but at the last general election the hon. Gentleman stood on a platform saying that things could only get better, when the sad fact is that in Norfolk, they have got worse. The chief constable said that he wanted 400 more officers, although that figure was reduced to 90 in the crimefighting fund bid and he got only 66—two thirds of what he asked for.

Police numbers are a serious issue; funding should be provided to restore them to the numbers that existed at the general election—an extra 2,300 officers. There should be greater visibility of officers in rural areas; my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe) unveiled her plan for officers on the beat to stop in shops and other public places to do their paperwork, to increase their visibility. Work should be audited so that we know what can be done most efficiently and effectively by police officers and what non-essential tasks can be done by civilian staff.

Under the Conservatives, police numbers increased by 15,000 and civilian numbers from 4,000 to 53,000, which allowed the police to do their work—

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Charles Clarke): Crime doubled.

Mr. Heald: The Minister says that crime doubled, but we turned it round; there were five years in which crime fell. [Laughter.] How can anyone laugh when, after five years when crime fell, it has started to rise again and the pace has built up, so that in September last year it was rising by 2.2 per cent. and now it is rising by 3 per cent? Where will it end?

The Minister must take the reasonable steps that we suggest. Although there may not be a direct correlation between police numbers and crime detection, there is a clear correlation between fear of crime and the numbers of police, who provide reassurance if their efficiency is maintained.

It is time that the Minister listened. We have had enough of the ORH report being put on the shelf and enough of, "Oh yes, we will do something about police pensions some day." The fact is that some day has come; we want answers and action now. The time for all talk and no delivery is over; the thin blue line cannot be stretched any thinner.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Charles Clarke): I congratulate the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard) on securing the debate. She has shown a consistent interest in this subject. I agree with the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald), who described the way in which the right hon. Lady spoke as firm but reasoned. She expressed her thoughts in a positive and constructive way, which contrasts with the intemperate style of her party's current leader on those matters. Some members of her party might wish that she spoke for it on such issues instead.

My only quibble in terms of substance relates to the suggestion by the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk that there is a lack of interest in rural communities in the Government. My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) took up that point with her, and I am glad that he did so. I take very seriously the points made by the National Farmers Union, the Country Landowners Association and the Countryside Agency, to which she referred. In particular, I take seriously the issue of crime against agricultural businesses, which the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire mentioned. His point is correct. I note that many schemes, such as the farm watch scheme, have been positive. Nevertheless, the issue is serious, quite apart from the problems that arise from rural isolation and fear, which many hon. Members have mentioned.

Two debates have already taken place on this question in the past 10 days, and I do not intend to go over the territory that I covered in those debates. However, I will make a point about the general context. Some crimes are specific to the countryside, such as the theft of livestock and farm equipment. However, in the main, rural areas suffer much the same sort of crime as urban and inner-city areas. The level of general crime is usually lower in rural areas than in urban or inner-city areas. For example, statistics show that the levels of vehicle crime, burglary and violence in rural areas are roughly three quarters of those in urban areas and about half those in inner cities. Across a range of offences—burglary, mugging, car theft, theft from a car, rape and racial attacks—research shows that the fear of crime is also markedly less.

In an interesting interview with the Yorkshire Post, the chief constable of North Yorkshire recently stated:

> Across North Yorkshire's largely rural two million acres we are driving crime down, year after year...
> I prefer to see the crime figures as a form of recognition of the first-rate work done by the county's officers. They are working increasingly closely with...the community we serve.

I do not want in any way to diminish the point made by the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk, because she is right to raise it in this way. However, it is important to establish the general context. As I said, we will publish a rural White Paper later this year. Our concern with crime in the countryside will be shown by the inclusion of a section dealing specifically with rural crime.

A large number of specific issues have been raised, to which I must respond. First, we accept the point about pensions. As I said last week, we are actively considering whether the matter can be dealt with nationally, rather than by every police authority separately, because the burden of pensions is distributed unfairly across police authorities.

I have only one quibble with Mr. Wilson, the chairman of Norfolk police authority, on best value. I believe that it is making a difference. It is improving the performances of all forces to the top quartile and thereby freeing resources for better policing. The right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk will be interested to know that the Government published last week a report by Clare Spottiswode, on the public services productivity panel, considering the possibility of varying the efficiency target instead of having a 2 per cent. efficiency target across all forces. We are considering that very positively, to try to find a more sensitive approach that better reflects the specific levels of efficiency in organisations.

On the police radio project, my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud is right that it makes a material difference to the police's ability to be in the communities that they serve. However, it is eccentric for Norfolk to suggest that the burden of paying for it falls on Norfolk specifically. Major criticisms have been made of funding, almost all from the main metropolitan areas. In general, most rural areas have acknowledged—for the reasons identified by my hon. Friend—that the project benefits rural areas and that the financial burden does not fall on them unfairly. I will discuss that matter with Mr. Wilson and the police authority, because he has also raised it in a letter to me. The issue is important, but I believe that he is wrong.

I have nothing to add to what I have said previously about sparsity. I have met representatives of a wide range of organisations, including all the relevant authorities from North Shropshire, Norfolk, Avon, Devon and Cornwall, West Mercia, and Gloucestershire, which are represented by people who have spoken in this debate. All those authorities are involved in the same consortium. Sparsity is being considered in the context of the spending review and there is a strong case for that. My hon. Friend the Member for North-West Norfolk (Dr. Turner) made the case about security in Gloucestershire and the same case can be made for Norfolk, which has Sandringham in its midst.

I shall not bandy numbers about any further, except to say that between March 1993 and 1997—under the Conservative Government—numbers decreased by more than a thousand across the country. Civilians are relevant. The example that I gave earlier about the loss of 49 police officers in Norfolk contrasts with an increase of 57 civilians, which is not atypical. Indeed, it applies across the country—

Mr. Heald: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Clarke: I will not, because I am pressed for time and need to deal with a range of specific points.

The hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) asked about parish councils. He made a powerful case. Parish councils are providing some funding. We are examining ways of increasing the role of parish councils. I have discussed with Church people in Norfolk how that could be achieved. Issues about specials and retained officers raised by the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Breed) could be considered within that context. It was right to highlight the importance of parish councils. As I said, we are examining ways of engaging more actively on that front.

CCTV is another important issue. We are attempting in several ways—including the use of mobile schemes of the type mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Norfolk, and the linkage of cameras to central control rooms, which has proved effective in different areas—to ensure that it can be used more effectively in rural areas. We are also reflecting on fenland problems—in the context of the relationship between Norfolk, Cambridgeshire and Lincolnshire—to establish what is causing the difficulties there and to try to help rural partnerships in those areas.

I much appreciated the points about youth justice raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud. It has been widely recognised and is making a material difference to the process. As to Minchinhampton, I am not familiar with the details, but I shall certainly ask the chief constable to write to my hon. Friend about the important matter that he raised. I shall not be tempted to comment on Crimestoppers because there is an Adjournment debate about it this evening, but I take it most seriously.

On the right to roam, I was intrigued by the proposition that criminals about to break into countryside houses in the middle of the night will be deterred or encouraged by the right to roam. Those issues are not related in the way suggested.

As I said in a recent Adjournment debate, partnership is a key part of the solution. Joint use of facilities is important and I was interested to hear about the possibilities of police doing their work in shops, schools, supermarkets and so on. We are actively discussing and seeking to encourage that in our review. There should be better use of joint facilities—church halls and schools, for example—to bring about a more tangible police presence locally.

We are also considering the roles of special constables and retained officers in the context of helping to develop local partnerships; and we are examining targeted policing to identify the hotspots. My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud made a good point about known criminals in particular localities. We wish to encourage better watch schemes. Farm watch schemes, for example, have been effective in dealing with some of the problems raised by the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire and the National Farmers Union. More effective alarm schemes and wardens are also important initiatives.

I mentioned technology. In addition to the police radio system, the national strategy for police information systems is important for getting rid of paperwork and developing better intelligence. Reference was made to abstractions of police for training or servicing the criminal justice system, which causes problems for local policing. I repeat what I said to the Association of Chief Police Officers: it is important that it, the police and the community as a whole give evidence and submissions to the inquiry on the reform of the criminal justice system, to which the Government give high priority. Debates should not be dominated by lawyers alone. The criminal justice system is relevant to the police and everyone who uses it. We must achieve a more efficient system for community safety. Changing the criminal justice system so that it places fewer burdens on the police and others is an important element of the process.

The debate has opened up the issue of self-defence and reasonable force. I commend what the shadow Home Secretary initially said on that matter:

> At the moment, I have yet to be persuaded that the law is at fault, because the law says you can use reasonable force.

Sir John Evans, the chief constable of Devon and Cornwall and president of ACPO, and many other police spokespeople have confirmed that position. The editor of the Police Review said:

> Worst of all is the dangerous knee-jerk reaction to Martin's conviction. William Hague, to his eternal shame, has sought to make political capital out of this tragedy by calling for a change in the criminal justice system.

That is a widely held view. I hope that more Conservatives will align themselves with the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk, who secured the debate, and the firm and reasoned tone in which she has expressed her arguments, than with their party leader.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody): Order.

Ancient Woodlands

11.30 am

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas (Harrow, West): Brands Hatch, the home of British motor racing, wants to destroy 37 acres of ancient woodland to create new facilities for the 2002 British grand prix. I am a motor racing fan. I relished the performance of David Coulthard when he won at Silverstone two weeks ago and delighted in the driver's world championship victories of Damon Hill and Nigel Mansell. However, the home of British motor racing should not be allowed to desecrate ancient woodland to build, among other things, a new media centre, a helicopter pad and new car parks.

Brands Hatch has owned the 37 acres for many years, using the area for off-road racing. At present, anyone who owns a wood under what are called permitted development rights can race cars in ancient woodland for up to 14 days a year. That can cause considerable damage. In its application for the new development, Brands Hatch claims that its rally school—for which it presumably received planning permission—operates not just for 14 days a year, but for 140 days a year.

Brands Hatch is just the highest-profile case. I have consulted Woodland Trust, which says that at least 35 other ancient woods are under serious threat. Ancient woods are one of the great irreplaceable and unsung glories of Britain's natural heritage. They are nature's cathedrals—timeless places of great beauty and tranquillity. A wood can be somewhere to head for, a place to stop for reflection on an evening's stroll and an indicator of the changing seasons. The bluebell-carpeted wood remains a timeless image advertising the beauty of our countryside.

Because they have long been undisturbed, ancient woods are often historical treasure troves. Bronze and Iron Age earthworks, ancient park boundaries or charcoal pits and kilns provide clues to past land use and local industrial history. As the habitat most representative of our original, natural, stable conditions, ancient woodland is home to more threatened species, such as the bluebell, than any other habitat in the United Kingdom. At least 45 woodland species became extinct during the past 100 years. Many remaining species, such as the wood anemone or Soloman's seal, which are found only in ancient woodland and have limited powers of dispersal, are struggling to survive.

The UK biodiversity action plan states that broad-leaf woodland, which forms virtually all the ancient woodland in the UK except for the Scots pine forests of Scotland, supports almost twice as many UK biodiversity action plan species than any other habitat. Only 309,000 hectares of ancient semi-natural woodland survive in England, Wales and Scotland. That is just 2 per cent. of the total land area. In Northern Ireland, no accurate records exist. Roughly 50 per cent. of Britain's ancient woodland has been lost since the first world war, mainly through conversion to conifer woodland and clearance for agriculture. Development pressures, the channel tunnel rail link, the Newbury bypass and countless well-known road schemes have destroyed or threatened areas of ancient wood. Increasingly, ancient woodland is found in small fragments—islands of biodiversity in a hostile landscape of intensive agriculture and urban sprawl.

I am lucky to have a fragment of ancient woodland in my constituency. I became familiar with Pinner wood during my time on the excellent Pinner Wood first and middle school governing body. The wood occupies almost the whole central portion of the beautiful Pinner Hill golf course and includes one of the oldest oak trees in Middlesex. I am told that the wood, formerly linked to other nearby areas of ancient woodland just outside my constituency, is a valuable nature conservation area, with excellent examples of oak and pollarded and coppiced hornbeam. Bridge pond in the woods is noted for its great crested newts and its rich variety of waterside and aquatic plants, including water plantain and white water lilies. A range of plant species that were previously recorded in the woods are now sadly extinct, including the frog orchid and the violet helleborine. Even in 1547, Pinner wood was 127 acres in size. By the time of enclosure in 1817 it was down to 26 acres and it now measures just two hectares. Not far from Pinner wood is Pinner Park farm, also in my constituency, which stands on the site of a former 100-acre ancient wooded enclosed hunting area. All that remains are the deer park boundary, which still awaits appropriate designation, and a relatively small number of trees. That is an example of the fate that has already befallen so many areas of ancient woodland.

Three broad threats to our ancient woods remain: their size, climate change and a series of legal loopholes. Some 80 per cent. of all ancient woods are less than 20 hectares in area, and 44 per cent. are between two and five hectares. As there are many ancient woods of less than two hectares not included in the current inventory, most ancient woods may be less than two hectares.

The trend towards smaller, more isolated woods has had several important consequences. Large areas of woodland are more valuable for wildlife than small areas. The size of woods is important because of the direct relationship between size and the number of species that can be supported. In addition, all species need a certain minimum area to breed and feed successfully. Core area is an important concept for ancient woodland. The edges of woods are more liable to fluctuations in the environment caused by wind and temperature and are more vulnerable to pollution such as pesticide spray drift. Many species specific to ancient woodland are unable to tolerate that edge effect and require the relative stability of the core of the woodland. The size and the shape of the wood affect the relative amounts of core area and edge. In addition to outright clearance of woodland, habitats between woods and other semi-natural habitats, including hedges, have been lost. Large arable fields have created barriers to migration. Improved grassland, pesticide drift, fertiliser migration in ground water and deep ploughing near trees have all taken their toll.

Perhaps the greatest long-term threat to our ancient woods, assuming that we are able to protect them from further development and fragmentation, is climate change, which is increasingly recognised as a major and as yet unquantifiable factor that will affect all of us in the future. There is already overwhelming evidence that climate change is happening. That creates particular dangers for ancient woods. The environmental stresses caused by summer droughts will make trees more vulnerable to disease and frost-free winters may prevent invernisation—many trees need winter cold to reset their clocks for spring and for the germination of seeds. It could also bring about increases in insect pest populations and bring over new pests from warmer climates, which may be able to survive all year round, as well as causing changes to flowering times, the nesting of birds or the emergence of insects, which may disrupt ecosystem functioning. While species may be able to migrate in response to climate change, many ancient woodland species are very sedentary, and migration of whole habitats will not be possible. The cumulative effect of all those impacts could be serious for ancient woods.

Existing legal loopholes include failures of the current sites of special scientific interest system. Some 85 per cent. of ancient woodland, including five of the 12 largest ancient woodland sites in England, lack SSSI or any other designation. Because sites are selected on the basis of a representative sample, many high quality sites fall outside the protection offered by SSSIs. In any case, current SSSI legislation cannot prevent landowners from neglecting woodland. We need to re-examine permitted development rights, which, when exercised for purposes such as scrambling, four-wheel drive vehicle racing or caravan holiday use, can damage ancient woodland. The removal of trees can be claimed to be necessary for such activity, since no felling licence is required for felling necessary for development that is deemed to have received planning permission, as in the case of permitted development.

The current felling licence system is another loophole. To be covered by a felling licence, trees must have a minimum diameter of 8 cm, so it is possible to remove young trees, shrubs and undergrowth from woodland. Up to 5 sq m of timber every quarter can also be extracted. When those two factors are exercised in parallel, they can severely degrade a wood in just a few years. As an aside, I point out to hon. Members that Northern Ireland has no felling licence controls. The tree preservation order system, which is not especially strong in England, is also much weaker there.

Policy on ancient woodland has moved a long way in the past three years. The remaining area of ancient woodland is one of 150 indicators of sustainable development outlined in "A Better Quality of Life: A Strategy for Sustainable Development for the United Kingdom", which was published last year. The England forestry strategy, which was published in 1998, also recognises the importance of ancient woodland. However, other positive measures are needed to close a series of legal loopholes. We must increase protection for sites of special scientific interest. The Countryside and Rights of Way Bill offers an excellent opportunity to strengthen protection for SSSIs, including ancient woods. We should also contemplate the creation of a new form of conservation status for important habitats outside the SSSI system through the creation of local wildlife sites. Stronger references to ancient woodland must be included in planning policy guidance. We should also consider improving the tree preservation order system and introduce felling licences in Northern Ireland.

As the last update to the planning guidance to local authorities on trees and woods was made more than 22 years ago, new and updated formal planning guidance to local authorities should be provided. We should review existing permitted development rights and rescind those that damage ancient woods. The Government are already committed to tackling the legacy of past land management policies, but several other specific steps might also be taken. A carefully targeted woodland creation programme could link ancient woods in areas where there is a high density of sites. That would increase the area of ecologically sustainable woodland. The farm woodland premium scheme could also be fundamentally reformed to ensure that woodland creation was targeted and supported planned expansion.

Urgent research should be undertaken into techniques and priorities for restoring ancient woods planted with conifers. We could also ensure that environmental payments to farmers were dependent on whole-farm plans that included sound management of hitherto neglected farm woods. In addition, we could argue for increased support for forestry and woodland expansion through European Union negotiations, based on the specific case of the United Kingdom's low woodland cover and low amount of ancient woodland. We should continue to encourage the take-up of environmentally responsible management of woods and forests through active support for the UK woodland assurance scheme and for Forest Stewardship Council certification schemes.

The Government are already working hard on a number of fronts in relation to climate change. We must continue to champion stronger support for renewable energy and energy efficiency in transport, homes, offices and industry. We need to recognise the role of carbon offsets in reducing the severity of climate change and to promote the value of woodland in helping to increase stored carbon by protecting the existing resource, increasing the rates of planting new woodland and using wood fuels rather than fossil fuels. Support is also needed for action intended specifically to protect ancient woodland from the worst effects of climate change by extending existing woodland areas and creating large areas of new habitat on a sufficient scale to sustain wildlife in the face of potentially rapid environmental change.

Size matters here. The Greater London area has some 2,203 hectares of semi-natural ancient woodland, 30 per cent. of which is found within the borough of Bromley alone. Before this debate, I consulted Trees for London, which told me that much of the tree planting in central London dates from Victorian times. Plane trees are particularly efficient at hoovering up carbon dioxide pollution. Thanks to the Victorian legacy, they are dotted along Park lane and other places, but I am told that those trees now need replacing. I hope that the mayor and the Greater London Authority will address that issue, in partnership with a range of other bodies and as part of an urgently needed strategy for London's trees and ancient woods.

Ancient woodland is part of our heritage. It is a crucial habitat for many species and is vital to the biodiversity of our nation. The Government are already committed to tackling many of the legal loopholes and land use and planning policy issues. I hope that my hon.

[Mr. Gareth R. Thomas]

Friend the Minister will be able to add a new sense of urgency and champion the need for new planning guidance, a greater protection of sites of wildlife interest and the use of grant aid to target action for strategic woodland creation. Is it not time that we drew a line in the sand with regard to Brands Hatch and said that enough is enough? We do not want part of our heritage replaced by a new car park and media centre.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Mr. Chris Mullin): My hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Thomas) made a good speech on an important issue and raised many points, to which I will do my best to reply. The Government share his view of the value of ancient woods. I do not claim that it is possible or, in some cases, desirable to create a system that protects such woods from all threats. However, we have taken a wide range of measures to protect them, as my hon. Friend acknowledged, and further measures are under consideration.

My hon. Friend mentioned Brands Hatch. The application to which he referred is before Sevenoaks district council. The question of the loss of ancient woodland will be initially for the council to consider. The application, should the council be minded to approve it, will be referred to the Secretary of State as a departure from the development plan. He will have the opportunity to call in the plan should he see fit. My hon. Friend will therefore understand that I cannot comment further on the matter for the time being.

My hon. Friend drew attention to the way in which the planning system deals with ancient woods. Land use planning plays a positive part in protecting trees and woodland in areas formally designated for their nature conservation value. Where there is no specific designation, the decision on priorities is deliberately left to planning authorities. That reflects the planning system's essential role as a tool to be used by those best able to take a balanced view of all the local considerations. Within that framework, planning policy guidance emphasises the importance of safeguarding the character of the countryside, of which ancient woods are an important element. It also suggests that local authorities should identify sites of local conservation importance, such as ancient woodlands, and include appropriate policies in their development plans.

The forestry forum is reviewing, among other matters, the existing guidance on trees and woods. The forum provides an opportunity to consider whether amendments to offer further protection to woods might be needed. My hon. Friend may be assured that the Government are aware of the arguments and will give them careful consideration. He might be interested to know that we recently added the Forestry Commission to the list of non-statutory consultees for planning applications involving ancient woodlands. That change is important and should ensure that local planning authorities have access to proper advice on the significance of threatened woods.

My hon. Friend referred to the need to take direct measures to protect and expand forest cover. I am pleased to say that the Forestry Commission is developing a new challenge fund aimed specifically at reversing the fragmentation of ancient woodland. Its revised woodland grant scheme rules will increase the grant aid for planting that defragments ancient woodlands. I do not like the word "defragment", but it is on my brief.

The use of local native species is widely supported, within practical limits, by the Forestry Commission and English Nature. The Forestry Commission encourages owners of ancient woodland to restock using natural regeneration where possible, or plants of local provenance if not.

The England rural development plan includes several funding measures that should benefit forestry. For example, there will be a 26 per cent. increase for the woodland grant scheme, bringing total expenditure over the planned seven years to £139 million. There will be a 37 per cent. increase in the farm woodland premium scheme. The adoption of the UK woodland assurance scheme is also strongly endorsed by the Forestry Commission, which, of course, was largely instrumental in developing it. My hon. Friend mentioned the situation in Northern Ireland, but I am sure that he appreciates that I cannot deal with that.

The most serious issues relating to SSSIs are neglect and inappropriate management. The Countryside and Rights of Way Bill will introduce management notices, which will be a useful tool to combat neglect. Other measures include conservation objectives and management schemes. The Bill will also introduce stronger controls over the exercise of permitted development rights by proposing that such operations may be carried out only with the consent of English Nature. The Bill will be complemented by revised guidance on planning for nature conservation and biodiversity.

It is true that the small size of ancient woodlands often means that they may not qualify to be notified as SSSIs. The local sites review group has been taking views on the identification, protection and management of such local sites. The group has submitted its initial report to the Department and we are considering the most appropriate way forward.

Any application for a felling licence for trees protected by a tree preservation order is handled by the Forestry Commission, in consultation with the local authority responsible for the order. If, after consultation, a felling licence is granted, the tree preservation order is overridden, but that is not a loophole. If the local authority objects to the Forestry Commission's proposal to grant the licence, the application is taken out of the commission's hands and transferred to my Department. The provision for a small licence-free quota, to which my hon. Friend referred, is seen as providing a reasonable balance between controlling felling and allowing small-scale woodland management without excessive bureaucracy.

It is the Forestry Commission's policy to prosecute wherever there is clear evidence of a serious breach of felling controls. In 1998-99, 337 cases of alleged illegal felling were reported to, or discovered by, the Forestry Commission. Investigations revealed that in 112 of those cases there was prima facie evidence that the regulations had been broken. In the same year, 17 prosecutions were brought and formal warnings were issued in 23 cases. A further 15 cases had still to be resolved.

Protection from felling in cases that do not involve development has been recently improved considerably by the environmental impact assessment regulations introduced last year. Any proposal to remove ancient woodland of more than one hectare will need a formal determination by the Forestry Commission as to whether an impact assessment is required. Where it is required, the commission will consent to deforestation only if the assessment shows that it will not have a significant effect on the environment.

As my hon. Friend said, climate change is a threat to woodland. A considerable amount of research is being done on the issue, one of the fruits of which has been a paper produced recently by Forest Research on the impact of climate change on trees. It suggests a range of possible effects, including faster tree growth in some regions and more severe damage by larger numbers of pests. It is too early to reach conclusions on the overall significance of climate change or on the measures that may be required to deal with it, but an integrated model of forest productivity that takes the various factors into account is now being developed.

The Government's draft climate change programme, published on 9 March, sets out a range of policies and measures for promoting better energy efficiency and new technologies. We have set a target to provide 10 per cent. of the UK's electricity supplies from renewable energy sources by 2010 and we want to encourage other more efficient ways of producing energy. For example, we have a new target to double the capacity of combined heat and power to 10,000 MW by 2010.

We also recognise the role of carbon offsets, to which my hon. Friend referred. In our draft climate change programme, we announced that we would encourage UK-based carbon offset projects that promote renewable energy, energy efficiency measures and forestry. The recent coppice-burning project successfully demonstrated one aspect of the potential for renewable energy.

In general, the Government accept that intensive agriculture continues to have a deleterious effect on wildlife. I cannot do justice to such a large subject today, but we are far from complacent and have put in place a considerable number of policies and practices to reduce its damaging effects, as well as incentives to encourage environmentally friendly farming. Measures are in place to control, among other things, the storage of silage, slurry and agricultural fuel oils and to ensure that Environment Agency authorisation is needed for the disposal of hazardous substances such as sheep dip and pesticide waste to avoid damage to species and adjacent habitats.

A range of financial incentives is in place to encourage better management, notably the substantial increase in support for agri-environment schemes in the England rural development plan. More than £1 billion will be spent during the seven years of that plan, including £566 million for the countryside stewardship scheme, £334 million for environmentally sensitive areas, and a threefold increase to £134 million in funding for the organic farming scheme.

As I said at the outset, the Government recognise the value of ancient woods. I hope that I have demonstrated that we have taken and are continuing to take a wide range of measures to protect and expand them, as well as to protect the wider natural environment of which they are a part. I hope that my hon. Friend agrees that we have a good story to tell. No one is under any illusions about the scale of the problem, but it is being addressed.

Tourism (Southend)

11.57 am

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West): I am a born optimist, Madam Deputy Speaker, so I hope that by the end of this short debate there will no one in this country or overseas who will not wish to visit Southend. It is a truly magnificent seaside resort.

Following the events of last Thursday, I hope that I shall be allowed to be somewhat self-indulgent. Local Conservatives fought the campaign on the slogan, "Wake up Southend". From my biased political perspective, Southend did wake up. Before Thursday's elections, the Conservatives were one short of a majority. There are now 25 Conservative members and 14 opposition members. Sadly, every one of the Labour party's candidates was defeated, and only two of the eight Liberal Democrat candidates were successful. A huge change has taken place in the politics of Southend.

Although many local people seemed to think that the council was still Conservative, it has not been so for six years. The Conservatives made any number of promises during the election and they are beholden to try to keep those promises. They dare not let the people down. We are taking over at a difficult time in Southend, just as the incoming Labour Government claimed that they were taking over the country at a difficult on 1 May 1997. I pay tribute to all those who have worked to promote the town as a seaside resort. It is a wonderful tourist attraction.

So proud are we of the town that we invited Her Majesty the Queen to visit us for the first time a few months ago. We are not permitted to repeat what members of the royal family have said, but her radiance when she and her husband arrived on the seafront to be greeted by hundreds and hundreds of schoolchildren said it all. She thoroughly enjoyed her visit to Southend. If Southend is good enough for the royal family, I suspect that no one could fail to enjoy a visit.

Over the years, Southend local authority has adopted a number of strategies to promote tourism. Traditionally, one of Southend's main roles was that of a seaside resort for staying and day visitors. At one time, it was said to be the second-largest resort in the country. Tourism gave the town much of its impetus for growth during the late 19th and the first half of the 20th centuries. It stimulated investment, employment and development, especially along the seafront. It gave Southend considerable status nationally and it encouraged migration into the town with the consequent expansion of housing, retailing and other facilities.

Of course, things have changed dramatically. Whereas some years ago 5 million people used to go abroad for their holidays, the figure is now in excess of 27 million. No seaside resort is nearer to our capital than Southend. It does not take too long to get there on public transport: 40 minutes on either the Fenchurch Street or the Liverpool Street line. If one is feeling depressed by the grind of the city, in no time at all one can be in an environment that will lift the spirits. Southend has a wealth of culture. It has singers, dancers, painters and sculptors. We have magnificent local talent, much of it inspired by the sea.

I am a Londoner. I was born here. I love London. When I was a child my parents used to take me to Southend for trips along the pier, which is the longest in the world at 1.33 miles. It is a magnificent attraction. I also used to be taken to Leigh to enjoy shellfish and one of the two finest ice creams in the world at Rossi's and Tomassi's. There is a bit of an argument in the town about who has the best ice cream and as I am friendly with both families, I will say no more. I found all those things very attractive as a child.

Given the 14 years that I spent somewhere else, I would never have believed it if anyone had told me that I would represent the place where I was taken as a child. However, it was a different sort of seaside resort then. Going abroad was something for the very well heeled. It was not within the aspirations of ordinary people.

The town has spent a great deal of time developing a tourism strategy. The Labour party applauds strategies, so that must find favour with the Government. British seaside resorts experienced a marked decline in visitors during the 1950s and 1960s due to changing leisure patterns, a lack of investment in new facilities and a widely held view that tourism was unnecessary for the town's future. That is crazy. Tourism is so very important for us all.

Madam Deputy Speaker, you and I visited a beautiful part of the world last year, but however beautiful the places that we visit, there is no place like home. The United Kingdom has so much to offer. People say to me, "But David, what about the weather? You cannot rely on the British weather." We can in Southend. Any meteorologist will confirm that we have the greatest number of hours of sunshine and the lowest rainfall—although that may not always be a good thing—and that the weather in Southend is always glorious. Anyone who suffers from asthma, hay fever and other such ailments will find that Southend can cure them all, due to the ebb and flow of the Thames estuary.

During the 1970s, the decline in tourism levelled, but left a legacy of environmental problems, especially in the Marine Parade area of Southend. There was also renewed awareness of the advantages of a thriving tourist trade and the likely cost to the town of stagnation and further decline. In 1985, the council reaffirmed its commitment to encouraging tourism and, in 1989, it published a corporate tourism and resort strategy. It acknowledged the potential benefits of leisure development, increased facilities, jobs and income for local residents and businesses and the need for the council to become actively engaged. I am delighted that the council, which is composed of members of all political persuasions, supports that strategy.

The aims of the strategy are: to promote the resort potential of the town by identifying development opportunities and encouraging the provision of new tourist facilities and visitor attractions; to work to achieve improvements in the environment of the main tourism area along the adjoining seafront; to retain an adequate stock of serviced accommodation and promote the provision of new facilities; and to encourage the provision of improved facilities for water recreation and the retention and development of entertainment, cultural and arts facilities.

I hear siren voices saying, "What on earth is the good of a wish list and strategy like that?" Unless we put down on paper what we wish to achieve, how can we measure whether we are achieving it? It is clear that no strategy can be set in stone because things are changing constantly, but in my view the local authority's decision to embark on some sort of strategy was an excellent idea.

The Minister for Tourism, Film and Broadcasting will be only too well aware that the Conservative party has published a document called "Tourism Today", the details of which I will not go into, much to the Minister's relief. The document talks about standard spending assessments and about help generally given for seaside resorts. The Minister will readily acknowledge that the decline of seaside resorts has been a problem generally. The hon. Lady's Department can do only the best that it can in the spending round against all the competing bids for health, education and other services, so I am not expecting her to be able to comment on that. However, I would support anything that she can do to encourage her colleagues to give more money to seaside resorts because we know well that they are extremely important for the United Kingdom's economy.

The two coastal areas in my constituency of Southend, West are Leigh and Chalkwell. In a debate a few months ago, I frankly expressed my dismay at the way in which the objective 2 negotiations had been handled. We were told before Christmas that Leigh and Chalkwell would qualify, but out of the blue we were later told that the fisheries strand was no longer being taken forward and that we were going for the urban strand and—hey presto!—Southend, West lost the £15 million that would have been available over five years. I complained that I had been elected to the House at the same time as the Prime Minister, but had never had a letter from him in all those years. The next day, a letter arrived from the Prime Minister, saying that he was aware of my disappointment about objective 2 status. He said that the then council knew all about the matter, although it said that it did not. Whatever happened, Leigh and Chalkwell lost out. I know that the Minister can do nothing about that now, but I hope that she will encourage those of her colleagues who work closely with the European Community to ensure that Leigh and Chalkwell are not left out.

The situation in Leigh and Chalkwell is different, but they need help. I have a wonderful briefing from Leigh town council, which makes it clear that, while Southend was set up as a tourist resort, Leigh was and still is a working marine village. It is just 40 minutes by train from London to that magnificent fishing village. It is "quaint" and has everything to offer, although because it is so quaint, it has no electric arcades, bingo halls or funfairs and is more peaceful than elsewhere. We have a tea room that sells clotted cream teas and we have quaint cobbled streets, a beautiful nature reserve called Two Tree Island and arts and crafts centres. We do not want Leigh to become an entertainment extension of Southend; we want it to retain its charm as a niche for tourists.

Leigh has access and parking problems and residents feel that their needs must be considered. There are also problems with boat access and accommodation. However, Leigh offers several opportunities. There are small craft shops in the old town and other specialist retailers in the town centre. We want to maintain Leigh's designation as a port to ensure that the marine industries stay in the town. Public transport access to Leigh and Chalkwell stations is good, there is plenty of space for walking, picnicking and nature observation, and food and drink are available from our wonderful restaurants. I was in Agostino's restaurant with a party of people on Saturday, and there is the Paris restaurant—indeed, we have every variety of restaurant one could imagine.

We want to keep the creek open to commercial boats and pleasure sailors and ensure that Leigh has a future as a working marine village. To do that, we need to dredge the creek, and we had hoped to get European money to do that. There is all sorts of talk about dredging that would keep the creek clear for only five years. If the creek is to be dredged properly, however, we need to spend more. That would mean a great deal to the local community.

Chalkwell is an attractive part of the town. Without question, Southend has the finest parks department in the country. Unfortunately, Chalkwell currently has a problem with graffiti. As I have mentioned many times in the House, we keep having meetings with the police, who keep finding the perpetrators, and we then move on to someone else. If the Government have a new strategy to deal with graffiti, I would be delighted to hear about it.

The newly appointed chairman of the leisure, culture and sports committee is our retiring mayor, Councillor Tony North. He is new to the job, so he is now putting his wish list together. I greatly hope that the Minister, who receives invitations from all over the country, will be able to visit Southend—she would receive a very warm welcome. She knows that we have had a challenging situation with asylum seekers, with one or two unfortunate incidents, but I am delighted that the Minister of State, Home Office, the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Mrs. Roche), is in Southend at the moment meeting my parliamentary neighbour. We hope for some good news in our attempt to sort out that difficult situation.

There has been £50 million-worth of investment in Southend in the past 10 years. The annual day visitor market is estimated at more 3 million. There has been increased film and television coverage of the town, some of which I do not welcome. For 14 years the chattering classes used to take the mickey out of my previous constituency. One or two television companies seem keen to come to Southend to show a few elements that are best not broadcast to the wider public. We welcome all visitors to the town, but under no circumstances do we welcome yobs or drug pushers, as all Members of Parliament would make plain. It is a shame that some television companies and a few other people appear to want to advertise the worst elements of the town.

Southend's marketing division won the British Resorts Association Daily Mirror trophy for the best brochure cover in 1999. I am not surprised—it has a fantastic cover with photographs of a crowd of models. Anyone reading it would ask, "Why did I go to Tuscany for my holiday last year when Southend looks so fantastic?"

Peter Pan's playground is every bit as good as Disneyland and has had more than 1.5 million visitors. I pay tribute to Philip Miller, who is an amazing entrepreneur. He has just taken over the Sea Life environmental centre in Southend. I am keen on tropical and marine fish and am delighted to tell the House that the centre is now breeding many species of sea horses from all over the world. In two weeks' time I shall visit the Chelsea flower show. Southend always enters the flower show and was a world finalist in 1999. The Southend air show is the largest free event in the country. Last year I stood at the air show with the mayor and my wife. In the sky we saw the Utterly Butterly light aircraft. My wife and the mayor wanted to go up. So, Madam Deputy Speaker, when you and I were in Kenya, my wife and the then mayor were strapped to the front of the two light aircraft raising money for local charities. The town stages the biggest special events programme in the south-east and all sorts of other events take place there. The Cliffs pavilion offers a range of magnificent plays and shows. The Palace theatre is wonderful, and Southend has many other activities.

How can the Government help? First, they can help with transport. Southend badly needs an east-west road link to free some of the traffic. It badly needs help with the pier—as the Minister knows, our lottery bid was turned down—and we should like help with our ambitious hovercraft plans. Finally, anything that could be done to help with the dredging of the creek would be welcome.

I hope that I have convinced everyone that Southend is a place worth visiting and living in. I am very proud of the part of the town that I represent and I hope that the Minister will do everything she can to help the promotion of tourism and leisure in Southend.

The Minister for Tourism, Film and Broadcasting (Janet Anderson): The hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) is clearly as good an ambassador and spokesperson for Southend as he was for his constituency in a previous incarnation, which we remember well. There was hardly any aspect of Southend life that he did not mention. He managed, too, to get in a reference to the Chelsea flower show; his skills in the House are undiminished.

The hon. Gentleman clearly understands the potential of tourism and its importance to his constituency. The Government also understand it very well—when the Prime Minister gave me this job, the first thing that I did was reverse the order of my title so that Minister for Tourism came first. That was a small gesture, but it shows that the Government understand the importance of tourism to local economies throughout the country and to the national economy. Tourism's national contribution to the economy is about £63 billion a year. It employs 1.75 million people and is the fastest-growing industry in the world. We want to ensure that everyone has a fair share of it and I know that the hon. Gentleman will do what he can to ensure that people in Southend, especially in his constituency, will be included.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the Conservative policy document on tourism called "Tourism Today". I like to think that the Government's strategy document was more far sighted, because we called it "Tomorrow's Tourism". As the hon. Gentleman said, one of the challenges is to keep up with changing consumer demand; the days when families went to the seaside for a fortnight's annual holiday have long since gone. The hon. Gentleman mentioned that the number of day visitors to Southend is about 3 million. Places such as Southend have to meet the demands of day visitors and appeal to people taking short breaks.

"Tomorrow's Tourism" was the first comprehensive tourism strategy produced by a Government. As the hon. Gentleman said, without a strategy, how can success be measured? We have already made substantial progress in reaching the target set out in "Tomorrow's Tourism". Last July, we launched the new English Tourism Council to replace the English Tourist Board, because a leaner, more strategic body was required to guide the industry in England and to carry out research into changing customer demand and other matters. It will focus on top-quality research, market forecasting, the collection and use of key information, the spread of innovation and best practice, promoting quality and developing a strategy on sustainable tourism and wider access. If I have time later I shall refer to some of the excellent practices that have been established in Southend.

The ETC has already made an excellent start; with its partners the AA and the RAC, it launched a new national accommodation scheme last September. We are determined to increase the voluntary take-up of that scheme and I am pleased that the local authority in Southend has a marketing policy of advertising only the quality-assured properties in that scheme. Visitors to Southend and other resorts will return again and again only if they can be assured of a good experience and value for money. That is what we want to encourage. I congratulate Southend on having an above-average membership of the national accommodation grading scheme.

The hon. Gentleman raised anxieties about asylum seekers. I am pleased that the Minister of State, Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Mrs. Roche), is today visiting Southend to see the situation for herself. Many of the points raised by the hon. Gentleman are matters for other Government Departments. The problem has implications for the tourist industry and seaside resorts such as Southend. In such cases we take every opportunity to make our views plain to other Government Departments. I have already had many helpful meetings with my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Home Office and some other colleagues who represent seaside resorts. The Government are doing their best to ensure that asylum seekers are dispersed only to places where there is not only available accommodation, but appropriate social and community support and educational and employment opportunities.

The English Tourism Council has set up a number of taskforces that will report towards the end of the year on tourism trends, transport, sustainability and resort regeneration. I am sure that Southend will have an interest in its recommendations. Indeed, the experience of places such as Southend will have informed those deliberations. Seaside resorts still represent an important sector of our domestic holiday market, but despite their continued wide appeal, many are finding it hard to adapt to significant changes in holiday trends. Ultimately, it is up to the individual resorts to devise sensible regeneration plans. The hon. Gentleman mentioned that £50 million had been invested in Southend. Obviously all the players in Southend understand the importance of that.

I congratulate Southend on taking advantage of its good rail connections to continue to attract large numbers of day visitors. As the hon. Gentleman said, it is the closest seaside town to London, which is a huge attraction. I also commend it for not resting on its laurels. I have never visited Southend, but I should like to take up the hon. Gentleman's invitation. I look forward to the cream teas and the seafood. He tells me that the shopping at Leigh is wonderful. Rossi's and Tomassi's ice cream sound extremely good. I wish the new owner of the Sea Life centre good luck with his venture. Sea Life centres have been finding things relatively difficult recently and I hope that he can turn it around for the benefit of Southend.

I agree that it is a great pity not to ensure that the longest pier in the world is utilised to its full potential. I wish Southend the best of luck with any further applications to the heritage lottery fund. The hon. Gentleman said that there was nothing that I could do about that, but there is something that might be helpful. My officials have arranged with the British Resorts Association that its conference in Eastbourne in June will include a session with some of the lottery distributors, including the heritage lottery fund.

I hope that will help to emphasise to the lottery distributors the important needs of seaside towns, which have particular infrastructure problems such as piers and promenades that are not found elsewhere.

I hope that that I have reassured the hon. Gentleman that resort regeneration is one of the Government's priorities. We have made a lot of progress already. As he knows from a conversation that we had outside the Chamber, my Department made strong representations to try to ensure that the needs of seaside towns were recognised on the objective 2 map. I am sorry and I understand the hon. Gentleman's concern that the two wards in his constituency that were on the original map were not accepted by the European Commission. He will know that that is ultimately a matter for the Commission. If it is any consolation to him, four wards in my constituency were removed from the revised map, too.

Many resorts are included and I am pleased to say that Southend is in one of the new enterprise grant areas that offer opportunities to smaller businesses. That helps to illustrate the progress that has been made in the first year since the publication of "Tomorrow's Tourism". That was just a springboard. It was not a one-off exercise. We intend to keep in constant touch with the needs of the industry. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for telling us about Southend's needs. I will do all that I can to press the case for the projects he has mentioned—the hovercraft, dredging the creek, the east-west road link—with my colleagues in other Departments.

Finally, I congratulate the hon. Member on the way he speaks up for his constituency. His constituents should be proud to have him as their representative.

Privatised Utilities (The Wrekin)

12.30 pm

Mr. Peter Bradley (The Wrekin): I am grateful for the opportunity to draw attention to the experiences of two communities in my constituency at the hands of privatised utilities. I am confident that in raising these matters I am speaking for thousands of communities, both rural and urban, up and down the country. Their needs have been neglected, their interests have been ignored or undermined and their environment and quality of life have too often been damaged and degraded. The two local examples are important for that reason. Through them I am raising issues of national importance.

I hope that the debate will lead to an acceleration of redress for the community of Hadley in the urban part of my constituency and of Preston upon the Weald Moors in the rural part. I also hope my hon. Friend the Minister will promise to close the loopholes in the permitted development system that enable utilities to ride roughshod over local communities. Perhaps he will go further and impose an obligation on utilities to provide the public services and fulfil the social responsibilities that they have jettisoned—as the high street banks have—in the single-minded pursuit of profit. That is long overdue and would be extremely popular. The privatised utilities would have no one but themselves to blame if tougher regulation were imposed on them.

I have raised the epic saga of the Hadley pylon before in the House. I am grateful to successive Ministers for the support they have given to the residents of Hadley Park road and Wheatley crescent and the indefatigable members of the Hadley pylon action group.

In November 1997, the Midland Electricity Board, acting for the private developer Cofton Land and Property, undertook to underground—which is a verb I have learned in the course of these events—cables beneath a proposed housing development. Cofton Land and Property's intention was to enhance the amenity of the residents of that new estate and to increase the number and value of properties that could be built on the site and thus the profitability of the scheme. The work necessitated the erection of a new pylon in roughly the same position as an existing one. The local residents may not have come to love the old pylon, but they had become used to it. The new pylon presented a different aspect. Looking out of the back windows of properties on Hadley Park road and Wheatley crescent was like being confronted by one of the monsters from H. G. Wells's "War of the Worlds". The morning after the new pylon was erected, someone waking up and opening the curtains would have thought that the Martians had landed.

The works were not undertaken for any environmental benefit, but purely for commercial reasons—to facilitate the development of 300 homes for sale—and at the expense of the existing community. The method of undergrounding was a reserved matter in the original planning consent for the development. Despite an obligation to do so, the MEB made no application under section 37 of the Electricity Act 1989 to take down one pylon and erect another. It did not consult the local community or initiate any negotiations with the local planning authority, Telford and Wrekin council. The MEB has claimed that it was not obliged to make an application or to consult, because the new pylon occupied the same space as the old one and, under the regulations, was therefore technically exempt from the process. That was simply one of many fabrications and untruths promulgated by MEB throughout this long and sorry story. It was disproved in May 1998, when the ever-resourceful and energetic members of the Hadley pylon action group secured—by what means I cannot say—a JCB digger and managed to excavate the foundations of the original pylon.

Faced with such incontrovertible evidence, MEB was finally obliged in July 1998 to concede that the pylon had moved. For Telford and Wrekin council—and, more to the point, the Department of Trade and Industry—that meant that MEB had been wrong not to apply for consent to move the pylon. In August 1998, 18 months after the works were undertaken, the DTI wrote to MEB expressing its "dim view" of the company's conduct and pressing for prompt retrospective action. As I mentioned, fabrication has regrettably played a greater part in the story than I should have liked. Delay has been another feature of the MEB's conduct. It has held the community, the local authority and, latterly, the Department of Trade and Industry, in utter contempt.

On 27 October, despite the plea from the DTI for prompt retrospective action, MEB refused to make the application that the DTI was urging it to make. In November, the DTI expressed "deep disappointment" at that decision. In February 1999, two years after the unlawful action, the DTI was obliged to threaten prosecution. It was pointed out to me that this would be only the second prosecution of its kind in 10 years. On 22 February last year, MEB promised that it would submit an application, but by July it had still not submitted to the council the background information and the detailed drawings and specifications that would make the application valid.

In October 1999, after showing extraordinary forbearance and patience, the council took the matter to an emergency committee meeting and rejected the application in favour of a public inquiry. Seven months later, MEB, now known as GPU Power Distribution, has threatened to move the pylon back to its original position. I use the word "threatened" because, far from seeking to appease residents, the company has made it clear that such a move would mean the compulsory purchase of part of their gardens. I mentioned the contempt in which MEB has held the local community and those who represent it in the past two years; that is the icing on the cake.

That cynicism is not atypical of the behaviour of MEB in my constituency and elsewhere—or of many other privatised utilities. The public inquiry that the DTI has now confirmed will take place will be of national significance. That is why MEB has resisted for so long. It knows that much will hang on the decision made at the inquiry. The current state of permitted development rights will be called into question. Those rights were referred to early in 1998 in a consultation document from the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, called "The Use of Permitted Development Rights by Statutory Undertakers". That document stated:

> PDRs are supposed to simplify procedure and hence remove administrative and procedural burdens from statutory undertakers in delivering their services.

The phrase "in delivering their services" is the critical one. I do not dispute the value of exemptions from the unwieldy and often lengthy planning process and related processes; nor do I dispute that statutory undertakers should have recourse to those exemptions, if they use them to provide essential services—such as gas, electricity, water or sewerage—to communities. However, those rights were not intended to facilitate commercial transactions between private companies pursuing profit at the public's expense, as has happened in this case. They were not intended to allow utilities to circumvent local authority controls in order to avoid their responsibilities and to make maximum profit at minimum cost. That is what happened in Hadley; MEB used its exemptions not to provide power, but to pursue a purely commercial transaction to facilitate a private development. I believe that that is an improper use of permitted development rights.

I hope that the Government will now act to ensure that new guidelines are issued to utilities and to local authorities. Those guidelines should make it clear that permitted development rights are to be used in future only in order to secure public services and public benefit, and that even then they should be exercised only under proper scrutiny and control by the local authorities. I hope that Ministers will also take the opportunity to review the compulsory purchase powers of the utilities. I believe that MEB has behaved disgracefully. The fact that the issue has come not just to local but to national notice is a credit to the Hadley pylon action group and its extraordinary efforts over the past two and more years. That applies especially to Ann West and Sandra Hodnett, who regularly attend my surgery and whom I confidently expect to see this Friday. They will not give up and neither will I. We are encouraged by the support that we have received from the Department of Trade and Industry and we hope to receive more, not just for the benefit of people in Hadley, but for the benefit of communities throughout the country that have suffered similar outrages. We confidently await the public inquiry, as we know that we have strong case.

The second issue that I want to raise concerns my constituents in Preston upon the Weald Moors—a small village just five miles or so from the major new town of Telford. Like thousands of settlements throughout rural Britain, the village does not have mains sewerage. Many such villages do not have access to electricity or gas—indeed, Preston does not have the benefit of a speed limit either. In this day and age, it is extraordinary that villages so close to major conurbations do not have the benefit of the essential services that so many of us take for granted.

In October 1998, following a visit that I had paid to Preston in the previous year, during which residents told me of their concerns about the lack of mains sewerage, and after protracted correspondence with Severn Trent Water, I received a letter from Mr. Robin Alexander. The letter was concise and to the point. It stated that > approval has been given to a sewerage scheme which will improve the drainage of both Kynnersley—

> a neighbouring village—
> and Preston on the Weald Moors.

It gave no qualification. It made it clear that the works would be undertaken. In subsequent correspondence, I was told that work would be under way early in 2000 and that it would be completed at the end of this summer.

A year later, in October 1999, I received a letter from no less a person than the managing director of Severn Trent Water, Mr. Brian Duckworth. He, too, put in writing the same assurance. The letter stated:

> I can also confirm that the Preston and Kynnersley project remains in our programme.

A few months later, in March this year, I was informed that the Preston scheme had been dropped altogether and that the Kynnersley scheme, which remained in the programme, was now unscheduled.

Those decisions were not made on the basis of the needs of the people in Preston upon the Weald Moors. Of the 37 households that responded to a questionnaire, 30 said that they were in favour of connection to mains sewerage and that they would be prepared to pay their connection charges. It is not that there is no physical need for a sewerage system in Preston; some of the septic tanks that are used by many of the householders are now leaking and could constitute a health hazard. A primary school in the village has similar problems. If the managing director of Severn Trent is to be believed, the reason for the scheme being dropped from the programme, despite the pledges that were made, is that Severn Trent Water is a company that is going down the plughole. Last year, Ofwat required a 14.1 per cent. reduction in the charges that it imposes on consumers. In a letter to me, Brian Duckworth said that Ofwat's long overdue initiative had imposed > very severe reductions in our income and consequently in our ability to fund capital projects.

That comment is from a company that, since privatisation, has imposed on householders a 90 per cent. increase in charges, has paid its shareholders more than £2 billion in dividends and has handed massive bonuses to its directors. In the past few months, it has announced 1,100 redundancies to add to the 2,500 redundancies suffered since privatisation by the men and women who worked for Severn Trent Water and secured its profits. The company never has to suffer, nor must it ever foot the bill—that is always for the consumer and the employee.

The situation provides the clearest evidence that, when privatisation is accompanied by inadequate regulation, there is cash on tap for the directors and shareholders of the privatised utilities—here, Severn Trent Water—and the service goes down the drain for the consumer. The previous Government were responsible for the disaster; I hope that the present one will take steps to make amends. As I said, it is disgraceful that rural communities should be expected to live without mains services in the 21st century. That is why, when the rural group of Labour MPs, which I chair, published its "Manifesto for Rural Britain" last month, it called for an obligation to be placed on the utilities to develop scheduled programmes of connection, with costs approved by the regulator, which would be affordable to consumers. That would enable isolated communities in the countryside to join the 21st century.

The people in the Preston upon the Weald Moors and Kynnersley case ought not to have to await action from the Government or from the regulator. Severn Trent Water made a cast-iron pledge to them in writing to their local Member of Parliament. I expect the company to honour its obligation and to recognise that it has a social responsibility to fulfil.

Severn Trent Water might think that it is up against a small community that does not have the resources or the resolve to challenge it. That view would be wrong—the residents of Preston upon the Weald Moors and Kynnersley are no less likely than the residents of Hadley to take this matter lying down. The villages may be small, but the residents will make a big fuss. I will do what I can to help them. I am grateful to the regional division of Ofwat and to its chairman, Clive Wilkinson, who has written to the company, making clear the regulator's position. He said:

> As a company of integrity that expressly sets out its desire to be customer orientated and provides high quality service we therefore expect schemes to be completed as promised during the current financial year.

Unfortunately, Ofwat's powers are limited in the matter. That is why I and the people of Preston upon the Weald Moors and of so many other communities in similar positions look to the Government to ensure that the utilities recognise, or are made to recognise, their responsibilities and that they live up to them. I have no problem with private profit or with utilities making their margin. However, I want that private profit to work in the public interest.

As I have said before, these issues will resonate in communities throughout the country. I hope that the Minister will recognise not only the importance of the problems to which I have referred, but the urgency of providing solutions to them.

The Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs (Dr. Kim Howells): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Bradley) on securing the debate. My Department is aware of the keen interest that he has shown in representing his constituency on the matters raised and in attempting to resolve the matter of the Hadley pylon. Before I proceed, I should tell my hon. Friend that responsibility for the behaviour of Severn Trent Water with regard to sewerage lies with the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions. If he wishes me to pass on to the relevant Ministers the evidence that he has quoted today, I will gladly do so. However, I cannot speak for that Department on the subject of connection to mains sewerage, important though the matter is.

I shall deal with the Hadley pylon. As my hon. Friend informed us, the story started about 26 months ago. In March 1998, the Department was alerted to a change sought by Midlands Electricity to a steel pylon off Hadley Park road in Telford—a change that caused great concern to local residents. It emerged that the work that the company wished to undertake breached the statutory planning regime. Although the regime makes provision for minor works to be carried out without planning permission or further Electricity Act consent being needed, that applies only within certain specifications as set out in regulations. In the present case, the Department concluded that the company had breached the requirements, and it wrote to Midlands Electricity in August 1998 to express its view and to ask the company to take prompt action to remedy the situation.

It is only right that companies should have the opportunity to reflect on the legal aspects of the Department's view and to make further representations.

[Dr. Kim Howells]

Breaches of statutory regimes are a serious matter and can lead to criminal prosecution. For that reason, although the Department will rigorously pursue alleged breaches in order to protect the credibility and integrity of the regime, it is far better for matters to be resolved constructively than for them to degenerate, with companies taking an entrenched and antagonistic position. As my hon. Friend told us, such breaches are rare. The Department has seldom had to take the extreme measure of prosecuting an electricity company. Indeed, as my hon. Friend said, only once during the past 10 years has the Department had to take an electricity company to court over a breach of the statutory consent regime. As my Department deals with up to 1,000 cases a year, that is a rare occurrence.

The Hadley pylon is exceptional, although I take to heart the general lessons that my hon. Friend draws from it. I realise that it may be no comfort to the local residents, who are frustrated at the apparent lack of action, but the Department has quietly and persistently moved matters forward. In March 1999, the company submitted a section 37 application, which was the Department's preferred course of action. The Department actively ensured that adequate information was made available by the applicant company, so that, after consulting the company and interested local parties, the local planning authority could come to a view.

It is a requirement of the section 37 process that a local planning authority, which represents the local perspective and has a detailed knowledge of the locality, should be able to give the Secretary of State a considered view. That the local planning authority has now done, following further discussions with Midlands Electricity—or GPU Power Distribution, as it is now known. The authority confirmed its earlier objection. The local authority wrote as recently as April asking for a public inquiry to be held. The ball is now in the Department's court. Unless material developments occur to resolve the matter, a public inquiry will be held. That statutory regime is specific: if the local planning authority objects and if, after discussion with the applicant, it does not withdraw its objection, the Secretary of State must hold a public inquiry. I believe that the objection has not been withdrawn.

I can understand that my hon. Friend and his constituents might feel frustrated by the protracted procedure, but it is obviously preferable to try to reach an agreed solution, rather than to have one imposed without time to reflect on the consequences. Public inquiries can be lengthy and costly, and without any guaranteed outcome. In our experience, this is an exceptional situation, which must be considered in the context of the Department's responsibilities for up to 1,000 overhead line applications a year, the majority of which are determined without a public inquiry.

In the few remaining minutes, I want to deal with my hon. Friend's comments about the overhead line regime in general. I am aware that experience may lead to calls for the regulations—whereby electricity companies can carry out works without requiring specific planning permission—to be revoked. Those regulations were put in place for reasons that remain perfectly sound. Like any installation, an overhead line will, in order to continue reliably and safely in service, need repair, refurbishment, modification or reconstruction. The extent of that work will inevitably vary.

Although the regulations provide for operational changes such as the installation of a temporary line while the permanent line is refurbished and the replacement of any existing line subject to specified limitations, there is inherent power in any existing consent to effect necessary repairs and improvements, provided that the appearance of the line is not materially altered. The relaxations specified in the regulations do not apply in specially designated areas and, for some changes, the company would need to obtain clearance from the local planning authority, which could require full planning permission to be sought.

When the regulations were introduced in 1990, wide consultation took place with electricity companies and local planning authorities, the outcome of which was reflected in the regulations. The regulations have been in force for some 10 years now without any evidence of fundamental problems. As I have said before, this case is exceptional, and despite my hon. Friend's most eloquent plea, the Department doubts whether it is appropriate to launch a major rethink without evidence that the regulations are not operating effectively. That is not to diminish the impact of the situation that my hon. Friend described, which is serious, but we do not believe that it necessitates a major rethink.

I am well aware that the view is often expressed that overhead lines should be put underground. However, there is no getting away from the fact that underground lines are significantly more expensive—at high voltage, in the order of 10 to 20 times more expensive. Ignoring for the moment the fact that underground cables are not without operational problems—they can take longer to repair, are less reliable and might not be suitable for all locations—the issue remains of who will pay for them. The wires businesses of companies are regulated businesses, which operate under price controls. My hon. Friend mentioned the fact that Severn Trent Water is in great difficulty as a result of price caps imposed by the water regulator, Ian Byatt. Price caps have also been imposed on the regulated parts of electricity companies' businesses, and, in many cases, they are stringent.

Companies cannot underground at will, and they would inevitably try to pass on the cost to consumers, both domestic and commercial. Those costs could be substantial. For example, it was estimated in the early 1990s that it would cost £100 billion to underground the whole system, which demonstrates the sheer magnitude of the situation. Developments in technology are unlikely to provide any immediate help in offsetting the cost differential. All that suggests that a sensible case-by-case approach must be adopted.

We have discussed a very difficult case, of which I assure my hon. Friend the Department is well aware. Unless the local authority produces new evidence, a proper public inquiry will be held. I know that my hon. Friend has pressed for that. He has represented his constituency well in that respect and his constituents must be proud of him.

It being One o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the sitting lapsed, without Question put.

[MR. MICHAEL J. MARTIN in the Chair]

Cosmetic Surgery

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mrs. McGuire.]

9.30 am

Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): I am grateful to have secured this debate, because it is a subject on which I have campaigned for a long time. I first introduced a ten-minute Bill on the regulation of cosmetic surgery in 1994. My interest started because one of my constituents had had silicon implants that had gone wrong, and as a result she had to have a double mastectomy, which left her feeling shattered. That ten-minute Bill generated considerable publicity. I was invited to appear on many programmes and to campaign with consumer organisations, such as Which?, and with the BBC programme "Watchdog", among others, which by then had had letters and telephone calls from innumerable people, mainly women, who had had problems with cosmetic surgery that had gone wrong.

Many of us have at some time in our lives wanted to change something about ourselves, perhaps the nose, the bags under the eyes or the spare tyre, because something about our bodies has not pleased us. I do not believe that anyone in this Chamber could say that they would not like to change something about themselves. For some people it becomes almost an obsession. Pressure is put on women in particular, but increasingly on men, too, to change their appearances, suggesting that they will have a better sex life, be more attractive to the opposite sex or simply feel better about themselves if they have some kind of cosmetic surgery.

In 1994, about 60,000 people had private cosmetic surgery. It is difficult to say exactly what the figure will be for 2000, but I suspect that more than 100,000 people a year request private cosmetic surgery, most of which is carried out in private clinics. I was tempted to bring the drawers of material in my filing cabinets to show how many people have written to me over the years on some aspect of cosmetic surgery.

My interest in cosmetic surgery began with silicon implants. I was contacted by many people who suspected that silicon had somehow leaked into their bodies. Having had silicon implants in their lips, faces, breasts or buttocks, they believed that the silicon had started to make them ill. I took various deputations to the Department of Health to try to persuade it to investigate silicon implants, but those pleas fell on deaf ears. It was not until July 1998, under the present Government, that the independent review body on silicon breast implants presented its recommendations to Parliament, a move which I welcomed. Previously, people did not even know how many silicon implants had been carried out in this country. There was no register or follow-up, and that work desperately needed to be done. As a result of that work, the Royal College of Surgeons agreed to develop multi-disciplinary clinical standards for breast implant surgery. The Department of Health accepted the recommendations of that review group on the compulsory registration of details of each breast implant and removal with the national breast implant registry. That was an important step forward.

The other aspect of cosmetic surgery on which I am still campaigning is laser surgery, which is offered almost exclusively by the private sector. There are no regulations for the training of doctors who work in private clinics, and no regulations to prevent a doctor in private practice who does not have specific experience from offering treatment. Some eye surgeons in Harley street and at Moorfields eye hospital contacted me about a year ago to say that they were concerned that there was nothing to prevent someone from setting up a business without a medical background, and that problems were often glossed over. Although many thousands of laser treatments on eyes are performed with few long-term complications, a small but significant number result in permanent damage to eyesight. That must concern us all.

Private sector clinics offer many procedures and people spend millions of pounds on cosmetic surgery. Although plastic surgery in the national health service is generally safe, the NHS has no time to perform cosmetic surgery. It spends its time for such surgery on people with medical needs, such as burns victims, cancer patients and those with limb deformities.

I remember a press conference that Sir Norman Browse, a former president of the Royal College of Surgeons, and I gave in the House of Commons a few years ago. It is not often that the president of that body emerges to give such a conference with a politician, but he said that he was concerned that too many people could set up shop as cosmetic surgeons with no qualifications. Unless they specifically claim to be doctors or surgeons, they do not even commit an offence. As soon as the so-called surgeons have the patient's consent, they can legally operate without any expertise whatever.

Horrifying though it may sound, Ministers could perform liposculpture in a private clinic, so long as they did not tell lies about their qualifications. That would be legal. Sir Norman Browse said at the press conference that animals were better protected in Britain than people because one had to be a qualified veterinary surgeon to operate on an animal. To do so without that qualification is to break the law. But a veterinary surgeon could operate on someone in a private cosmetic clinic without being taken to task.

Far too many butchers practise in some clinics. Repair of botched surgery can be time consuming, expensive and embarrassing to the person involved. It sometimes has to be done on the NHS and can cost as much as £10,000. There may be a long wait for surgery, especially as the disfigurements, though nasty to look at, are not life threatening.

Many of the clinics get a lot of business from advertising in national newspapers and women's magazines, in which they often use misleading images. I have had correspondence with the Advertising Standards Authority, which has tightened up the regulations a little, but not enough. The advertisements make claims such as "Walk in, walk out", "Gentle surgery", "Looks you always desired", or suggest that to change one's whole outlook on life one should have a particular type of cosmetic surgery.

I looked at some of the ads in some current magazines last night, and there are pages of them. One states:

Cosmetic surgery with the gentle touch. The Lanark Centre is owned and run by medical experts, specialists in their chosen branch of cosmetic surgery. We believe in a caring, holistic approach—ensuring you complete peace of mind as well as giving you the body you want.

Others offer a wide range of treatments, stating:

Consultations with our highly experienced FRCS surgeons are FREE. Breast enlargement, breast reduction, breast uplift, classical facelift, mini facelift, chin tuck, neck lift, eye improvement, nose refinement, fat removal, ear correction, tummy tuck and so on.

Cindy Jackson is an example of the extravagant claims made in those advertisements. I remember her because she sat in the audience at some of our press conferences. She is described as a walking advertisement for cosmetic surgery.

She says:

I am over 40, but after extensive cosmetic surgery, I look better than I did at 21. My exceptional results have attracted worldwide acclaim. Now others benefit from my unequalled knowledge and firsthand experience. No one need repeat the same mistakes I made at the beginning due to lack of realistic information, or have to learn, as I did, by trial and error.

She offers a Guide to Cosmetic Surgery, unique personal Video and much more.

The adverts go on and on. "Specialist in figure re-shaping", one of them says. It is accompanied by various sketches of before and after, showing soft liposculpture. One says:

Dieting or sports takes time. With soft-liposculpture we will permanently remove the fat excess where you need to (thighs, knees, stomach, bottom, arms . . .) and sculpt your new silhouette.

I mentioned Cindy Jackson and liposculpture for a particular reason. Today, I spoke to Toni Rust who, in a letter to me last year, said:

I have made countless inquiries to different organisations to find out if there are any support groups for Cosmetic Surgery patients and apparently there is not, but there is a desperate need for this kind of support and advice network.

I know only too well about bad cosmetic surgery.

She went to have the bags under her eyes that she had had since she was a teenager removed. She said that she had undergone an upper and lower blepharoplasty which has left me disfigured and scarred and with eyes which do not close. My eyes are also extremely uncomfortable, and it is 18 months since I had my operation. I thought that I had gone down the right route to finding a good cosmetic surgeon, having contacted The Cosmetic Surgery Network, a business run by Ms Cindy Jackson. I did not know at the time that she was either working for or with the surgeon Edward Latimer-Sayer who had done most of her surgery. I believed that her Network was independent.

The advert in question was clearly misleading.

I asked Toni Rust whether I could quote her letter today. She said that I could, because there were hundreds of women with the same concerns as herself. She said:

Of the people I have been in contact with so far who have had bad cosmetic surgery, their stories are a mirror image of each other. This is not only from the physical disfigurement and emotional turmoil that they find themselves in but because of their surgeon's comments. The words: it has never happened before; it is just the way you are healing; you must give it time; I can't see anything wrong; it looks alright to me; cosmetic surgery is not a 100 per cent. science. They have got an answer for everything and at first you believe them because you do not like to disagree with your surgeon. You were originally in awe of them, you respected them, but gradually you come to realize that they are not all in the same category and that there are some very unscrupulous so called surgeons out there, unskilled and unashamed . . . I just wish that I had known 18 months ago what I know now. If I had known, then I would not have been "butchered" by an unskilled and irresponsible surgeon. I need to share this information, the same as the other people who have contacted me to try and stop this happening to others.

I looked up two cuttings, one of which, dated 20 April from The Guardian, is headed "Model wins £93,000 for ruined looks." The article states:

A former male model who claimed his looks were ruined by inappropriate cosmetic surgery, yesterday won damages totalling £93,000 at the high court in London. Mark Russell, 36, had sued Harley Medical Centre Ltd. and the surgeon, Alan Kingdon, over liposuction he received at the Harley Street clinic in 1989...The defendants admitted failing to give proper advice, warning or counselling about the likely outcome of such treatment and that the surgery was wholly inappropriate and unnecessary.

Another cutting, which appeared in The Daily Telegraph on 28 January, was written by that paper's medical correspondent. It states:

This week, a coroner gave warning of the dangers faced by women who consent to non-essential cosmetic operations. He was commenting after the death of Lorraine Bull, 36, who had scraped and saved for a £5,500 operation to remove 3lb of saggy tummy fat after having caesarean section. She was determined to have the routine "tummy tuck", which was carried out at an independent hospital, but her death raises, once gain, the question of how fully women—and men for that matter—understand that all surgery can have complications, sometimes with devastating consequences.

So much of the advertising is totally misleading, because it does not give the impression that there is any danger in carrying out these procedures.

Christine Doyle, the medical correspondent, continues:

It seems so simple to lift the face or shift some fat, blast wrinkles with a laser, inflate lips to perfect pouts and breasts to seductive perfection, slim the ankles and resculpt the tummy and thighs . . . Anyone can be young and beautiful. Just sign the consent form and write the cheque.

Many more men are now having cosmetic surgery, because of competition for a jobs in an ageist society. People go to job interviews and are told that they are too old—as was my researcher at the age of 35. One article states:

Job competition and the desire to attract younger women can lead tired men to opt for invisible upper and lower eyelid snips, removal of frown lines, and a touch of jowl tightening. Entertainers are regular customers.

It does not mention politicians.

Another case that I drew to the attention of Which? was that of a woman called Joyce. She had seen a lot of adverts for liposculpture, and was so impressed with their claims that she felt sure it would give her the figure that she dreamt of. She contacted a private clinic, whose promotional leaflet said that liposculpture was a straightforward and minor operation. She agreed to pay

£2,500 to have liposculpture to her knees, thighs and hips in two stages. She was awake throughout the two-hour operation. She believed that the local anaesthetic must have worn off after 45 minutes, as the pain was intense. She went home the same day, her legs in blood-stained bandages. She got little advice after the operation and ended up having to take two weeks off work. She was supposed to have follow-up appointments but they did not occur. Her left knee still has a large flap of overhanging fat and is a completely different shape from her right knee. She had many lumps, bumps and pits on her legs. Needless to say, she was extremely disappointed with the results.

Such incidents are common. I heard from someone who was given liposculpture in a ground floor office in Harley street. She said:

> I think the operating table was a dental chair. They asked me to turn over onto my stomach, or my side, but the chair was the wrong shape and it was very difficult. At some stage during the operation I woke up. I was in tremendous pain and began screaming. They were still taking fat from my legs. The doctor told me afterwards that he had to continue with me awake or my legs would have been uneven.

The level of complaints, unless victims write to Members of Parliament, and so on, or talk to magazine and newspaper journalists, is low, because people are often acutely embarrassed. Filing a complaint is the last thing on their minds. One victim told me that when her surgery went wrong,

> It shattered my whole life and left me feeling suicidal.

Even if people do complain, they have to follow complex and potentially confusing procedures. To prosecute for negligence, one must sue the doctor involved. That is a costly and drawn out procedure, requiring a patient to draw attention to her disfigurement. Many people go to private cosmetic clinics without even telling their nearest relatives, so they are hardly likely to want to draw attention to what went wrong afterwards. I know one woman who could not bring herself to tell her family that she had spent £5,500 and ended up looking the way she did, so she made up a story about having been involved in a car crash. That is the level of embarrassment created by procedures that go wrong.

Some of the clinics and adverts are, as it were, selling body parts by mail order. The clinic surgeons often work on a commission, so the more operations they perform, the more money they pocket. One woman said:

> I was sitting in his office and he said to me, "Your under-eyes need doing also." I had never noticed any bags or sagging, but he had such a wonderful bedside manner, I thought to myself, "I must trust this man".

Newspaper and other reporters have gone to cosmetic clinics to investigate them; they are usually aged about 21 and in most people's eyes look perfect, with nothing wrong with their appearance. They go to those clinics, and the hard sell begins. One reporter told me it was incredible—it was as though they were totting up on a calculator, as fast as they could, what they could do.

I shall quote further from the letters that I have received. One woman spoke of > unbearable pain during surgery . . . two scars on belly-button and on hips, and post-traumatic stress disorder and another said:

> I suffered excruciating pain for more than a year and referred to the results of her operation as a "disfigurement". Many women mention not just the physical but the psychological problems, for example a feeling of total isolation, encountered after botched surgery. Another woman said

> I felt so bad I eventually took an overdose. I really wanted to die.

Someone else said:

> I just wanted to die, which I did inside.

A Minister with responsibility for health in the previous Government repeatedly told me that he was not convinced that a case had been made to show that the existing controls were insufficient. Clearly, that is nonsense. A couple of months ago, I said in the Chamber that, unless some action was taken against a particular surgeon, I would name him in the House. I shall do so now, although he has now since been named on television. David Charles Herbert is a cosmetic surgeon, who works in the private cosmetic surgery industry. He has earned the nickname of the flying doctor for the speed at which he carries out his surgery and the brief time that he spends with patients, especially post-operative patients. Apparently, he performs 35 surgical procedures a week and carries out a face lift in only 40 minutes, which other surgeons say should take between two and four hours. He has operated from clinics in Huntingdon, Preston and Nottingham.

Over the years, David Herbert's work has generated a huge number of complaints, mainly from women. Allegedly, one woman nearly died after a bowel infection following a tummy tuck; one woman was left with a gaping hole in her stomach after a tummy tuck; and several women have had to have corrective surgery after David Herbert performed breast surgery. He performed a face lift without using enough anaesthetic. The list of allegations goes on. I could spend the entire morning repeating the list of complaints against him.

In 1986, Mr. Herbert was apparently asked to leave one hospital in Nottingham after the operating theatre staff refused to work with him. As far back as 1988, he was the subject of a BBC "Watchdog" exposé, which involved four alleged victims of his surgery. He did not sue the programme makers, but instead went to ground for a period. It has been alleged that Mr. Herbert often settles with patients out of court to avoid the bad publicity that would come with a court case. Several surgeons have also made serious observations about his work, describing it as verging on the psychopathic and crude, and describing him as a psychopath, saying that anyone with an ounce of moral integrity would not go around causing permanent disfigurement; that that is not how doctors act. It has also been said that he is careless and carries out bad, rushed surgery. It is rare for a doctor's colleagues to make such observations.

Mr. Herbert is still operating and my dossier of evidence about him is as gruesome as it is long. The BBC's Sally Chidgey first raised the allegations with the General Medical Council in November 1999. In January this year, she contacted me with a dossier from Mr. Herbert's patients and I then wrote to Finlay Scott, the chief executive of the GMC. On 2 February, I raised the matter in the House and I also forwarded the evidence to the Secretary of State for Health. In April, I received further witness statements from the BBC. Some 70 complaints have now been made as a result of the programme about the surgeon. The slow progress made by the GMC and the fact that he is still continuing to operate prompted me to chase up both the Department and the GMC. The Government's chief medical officer, Professor Liam Donaldson, has sent all the evidence to the GMC asking for an urgent update on its investigations into Mr. Herbert.

I then contacted the GMC again and spoke to Isabel Nisbet, director of its fitness to practise directorate, for an update on progress. On 27 April she confirmed that the GMC would not try for a misconduct charge against Mr. Herbert because it would be too easy for him to get away with it, as he could bring witnesses– former patients—who could testify to his excellent surgery, skills, conduct and so on.

That seems a strange defence for an accused person. Supposing somebody being tried for murder brought 100 witnesses to the court to testify that, because he had not murdered them, he must be innocent of the one murder of which he was accused. The fact that Mr. Herbert may have performed some operations—perhaps many operations—satisfactorily is irrelevant. It is the cases and the evidence that we have, which allege that he performed badly, that matter.

What is more, the GMC says that, under the present law, it cannot suspend Mr. Herbert pending the outcome of the investigation. Therefore, the GMC has decided on the professional assessment option because it offers a better chance of a successful outcome in terms of making the charges stick and has apparently informed all the complainants of that fact.

The GMC wrote to Mr. Herbert on 25 April to say that it is minded to invite him for a professional assessment before two plastic surgeons and a lay person. He has until the end of May to reply with his comments. After that, provided that he does not appeal against an assessment, he will be assessed and, if he fails, he will be suspended for a period or have conditions set on his work or his employment. The danger with that option is that Mr. Herbert could have a good day and pass the assessment with flying colours, in which case he would be free to carry on, in many cases, unfortunately, disfiguring patients for life. To judge by his past record, the likelihood is that he will avoid a showdown with the GMC and go into retirement.

In view of what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said earlier this year in the Chamber about the GMC's performance, that is a totally inadequate response to the information supplied to it, nor is it new information. Apparently, it had previously received complaints about Mr. Herbert. In the meantime, he has been allowed to carry on regardless.

This morning, I heard from Toni Rust, whose letter I read earlier, that a friend of hers phoned the GMC as recently as January this year to ask for advice on which cosmetic surgeon to choose. She asked specifically about Mr. Herbert and was told that he was all right. No official register of cosmetic surgeons is kept by the GMC, but it can apparently supply information about the area of surgery in which a certain surgeon has trained. It is incredible that the situation has been allowed to go on for so long.

In answers to me, the Government have pointed to the safeguards that exist. The Registered Homes Act 1984 provides for the registration and inspection of private cosmetic surgery clinics by health authorities. I do not know how often such inspections are carried out, how vigorous they are, or what the results are.

I gave evidence to the Select Committee on Health, which published its report last year, giving it some of the information that I have collected since 1994. That Committee made all kinds of recommendations. A couple of months ago, the Under-Secretary of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Ms Stuart), said:

> We recognise that greater assurance for the public is needed about the safety and quality of the treatment being provided in this area. We therefore intend to introduce improved regulation of independent healthcare services . . . These measures are included in the provisions of our Care Standards Bill.—[Official Report, 1 February 2000; Vol. 343, c. 555W.]

I am pleased about that progress, but the Bill sets out only general principles; it does not contain any real detail about regulations and standards. I know that the Government are carrying out a consultation process with the aim of drawing up the regulatory and inspection framework criteria, but, as far as I know, no date has been set for the completion of that process.

A number of measures need to be implemented as soon as possible. The complaints procedure for patients must be improved. Patients need improved mechanisms for obtaining redress for their complaints. The position of the GMC should be reviewed. The medical profession regulates itself through the GMC, but it might be better for patients and the medical profession if an independent body were to be responsible for investigating complaints and disciplining doctors and surgeons. An independent disciplinary body must be given effective teeth. Pending a decision, people who are being investigated must be suspended; they must not be allowed to practise in the meantime. It is incredible that Mr. Herbert should continue to operate, given the seriousness of the complaints against him. I cannot think of any other profession that would allow that.

Can the NHS offer more cosmetic surgery? That is currently lacking. I understand that rationing is necessary, but it means that people are forced into the private sector. When the NHS has to correct the negligence or malpractice of private cosmetic surgeons, it should be able to reclaim the costs of that treatment from the private sector. In order to raise standards, everyone in the private sector who carries out plastic surgery should be made financially responsible for the outcome. If a patient has to have corrective surgery, those who carried out the original botched surgery should pay.

Patients must be better informed; they should not have to rely on advertisements. Sometimes even asking one's GP is not entirely satisfactory. There must be other methods of telling patients where they can get the best possible treatment in the private sector.

There should be a review of the training of cosmetic surgeons, with a view to establishing recognised specialist training and regular professional assessments. No doctor, surgeon, or any other person should be allowed to practise cosmetic surgery without formal training or accreditation in that specialty.

A mandatory peer review audit process should be introduced into the private sector. Regular scrutiny of surgeons' competence is undertaken by other doctors or surgeons. The surgeons who made the complaints against Mr. Herbert found it very difficult to make them formally to the GMC. We have those complaints on record, with the names attached.

I do not ask for all those matters to be dealt with immediately. However, if some of them could be addressed, it would give recognition to genuine competence and experience, while rooting out incompetence.

Someone suggested to me that for a patient to have complicated surgery practised on them by someone who is not experienced in cosmetic surgery is equivalent to boarding a jumbo jet and finding that the pilot has been trained only on a crop-spraying plane. I do not know whether that analogy is correct, but it gives an idea of the frustration and concern felt by many of the people who have written to me who have suffered physical damage.

I received a letter from a teacher—these letters are not from stupid women who do not think about what they are doing—who told me that, after reconstructive surgery on her nose, she cannot wear her glasses for more than half an hour because the side of her nose collapses. She has had two operations to try to rectify the problem, but it is still not right. Some women cannot close their eyes properly; some look as though they have been in a car crash; others have large indentations in their bodies. All these women have been promised many things by the advertisements. The Government have a responsibility to introduce the kind of regulation for cosmetic surgery that is long overdue.

Dr. Peter Brand (Isle of Wight): I congratulate the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Ann Clwyd) on raising the issue and pointing out the need for the debate. The case histories that she has given clearly demonstrate that this is an important issue.

I should like to address the matter under three headings. The first is consumer protection. Someone who goes out into the marketplace to buy a service should be protected from incompetence, shady practice and over-promotion of a product. The second heading is medical competence. We have had illustrations to show that that is not always satisfactory. The third is medical ethics, which raises the question of whether it is appropriate to offer some of the surgery available.

The Health Committee has addressed the issue of private cosmetic surgery in two reports: one on the control of private medicine, the other on the unexpected and often disastrous outcomes of medical intervention. It is interesting that cosmetic surgery has provided the best examples of areas that lack regulation and consumer protection. I am glad that the Government have taken notice of those reports. When I questioned the previous Secretary of State on the matter, he said that it was a matter for the private sector, not for a Secretary of State for Health who was solely concerned with standards in the national health service. I am glad that there has been a change of mind on that matter, because the hon. Member for Cynon Valley has highlighted some important issues.

Consumers become quite confused about cosmetic surgery. We have been given illustrations of the hyped claims made for surgery outcomes: one will be more economically prosperous; one will get a better job and have a better sex life; one will be more interesting. In my experience, rather than becoming more interesting, people who have had a great deal of cosmetic surgery tend to become extraordinarily boring because their only topic of conversation is their surgery. It is frightening to read advertisements that present an idealised picture of the perfect human being that can be created. Those are not the kind of aspirations that should be encouraged. I am sorry to say that the Advertising Standards Authority has proved itself to be completely toothless. It receives many complaints and it has guidance on these matters, but it ignores that guidance more frequently than it adheres to it.

One of the main problems, from the consumer's point of view, involves the balance of accountability between the organisation that employs a surgeon and the surgeon himself. Discussions with a patient and those involved with advertising are conducted through the organisation or clinic. The person who is considering having cosmetic surgery has an appointment with a consultant, who is often a handsome lady in a white coat who probably trained on the Clinique counter in Boots rather than as a consultant in cosmetic surgery. There is no protection against the misleading use of the phrase "cosmetic consultant" in the circumstances that I describe.

Things may go right—if people pay their money and like the outcome, that is fine—but if things go wrong and a complaint is made against the clinic that took the cheque for the service that was provided, the clinic's usual response is to say that responsibility lies not with it but with the operating surgeon, who is contracted but not employed by it. Claims have to be made against the surgeon, not the clinic. That situation cannot be acceptable. People often do not realise that that is the case, and, not infrequently, they do not meet the surgeon before they pay their money. I shall discuss the Select Committee's recommendation in that regard later.

It is important for people to realise that no surgery is without risk. The basic issue in relation to cosmetic surgery is that there is no such thing as minor surgery, although there are minor surgeons. The General Medical Council has a specialist register, but it does not specify the specialism that the people on the register have. The GMC also resisted setting up a specialist register for cosmetic or plastic surgery—it relies on trade organisations and professional bodies to provide that service. That is confusing to the consumer because most people believe that the GMC's role is to maintain the standards of doctors who offer their services to the public.

I have a surgical qualification and I am a member of the Royal College of Surgeons, which probably qualifies me to remove a wart or an appendix, but that is about the extent of my surgical expertise. Having a surgical qualification and being a fellow of the Royal College of Surgeons demonstrates surgical expertise in a general field, but it does not demonstrate that someone has specialist training in a particular area. We have already established this morning that the results can be disastrous.

[Dr. Peter Brand]

Concerns have been expressed about silicone implants. I was concerned to have read during the weekend that much cadaveric material is now used in implants. People have dead donor tissue rather than silicone injected into their lips to make them more pouting. The situation is obscene: people donate their organs to save lives, but some of their bits are used for breast enhancements or for what I believe is called facial sculpting.

The Select Committee highlighted concerns about laser surgery, which can be extremely helpful. We should not fail to recognise that plastic and cosmetic surgery have an important role to play in the treatment of patients. It is totally justifiable to try to remove obscene tattoos inflicted on someone at the age of 16 who was drunk. It would improve his prospects for employment as, for example, a waiter, if he can have obscene language removed from his hands. I am pleased that laser treatment has something to offer and, if expertly done, can be effective and not very expensive. I echo the comments made by the hon. Member for Cynon Valley: the NHS should have a greater role, and we should not abandon people to the private sector.

The second issue relates to medical competence. The General Medical Council must get off the fence. It is essential that registers showing the specialism of the people listed be maintained. Ordinary members of the public should be able to go to the public library, look up the interests and expertise of the people on the list and see how competent and well trained they are in their particular field.

The third issue is one of medical ethics. Someone who is operating incompetently is behaving unethically. It is bizarre that, in the illustration used this morning, the General Medical Council has not taken a more active role, if only to protect the name of the surgeon concerned if he is innocent of what has been alleged. It seems extraordinary that such allegations can be made, without any action being taken. That is in no one's interests.

There are a number of outstanding issues. The Government have done a great deal to protect the users of medical services, setting up the Commission for Health Improvement and the National Institute for Clinical Excellence and establishing clinical governance. They are all positive steps. Unfortunately, the Government have, for what I believe to be dogmatic reasons, left the private sector outside the framework. That is disappointing. Clinical governance is just as important in the private sector as in the NHS. The creation of a special body parallel to the NHS will not feed good practice from one sector of health care delivery to another. Without doubt, the NHS can learn from the innovations introduced in responsible private practice, especially in this field. The more reputable clinics have a great deal of experience that could be of benefit to the NHS. Indeed, the NHS could occasionally contract to the private sector desirable and essential plastic surgery, if a private clinic were better geared up to carrying it out.

A number of recommendations could be made. One is that the Advertising Standards Authority might as well be disbanded if it will not do its job properly. There should be an investigation into the effectiveness of the Advertising Standards Authority in all its work, but specifically in an area such as this, where vulnerable people with hyped-up expectations are not always the best judges of how to act as a consumer. The patient as consumer is a nice concept, but unless people are extremely well informed, they need a lot of information to make informed choices. One reason why I am critical of the Advertising Standards Authority is that its code of practice does not cover the information that a patient can expect—information such as the success rate for an operation, for the organisation offering it or for the surgeon carrying it out.

On the consumer side, there must be a clearer framework of accountability when things go wrong. In the national health service, it is now accepted that, through clinical governance, either the medical director or the chief executive of a trust is responsible for everything that happens in that trust, although liability may of course be passed to clinicians further down the line. In the private sector, there seems to be a tradition whereby the employing authority or contracting authority washes its hands and passes responsibility to the clinician carrying out the work. That is not acceptable.

The public are entitled to a specialist register that has meaning. Again, the Government should take action in that regard and instruct the General Medical Council. If they cannot do so under current regulations, the regulations should be changed to ensure that information is available to members of the public.

The medical profession has lacked application in respect of the important issue of medical ethics. Those who apply for surgery are vulnerable, and it is essential that they be protected as patients, as well as consumers. At times, the ethical approach is to say no to someone who requests a particular intervention. At the moment, there seems to be no framework for addressing that issue.

I endorse the recommendations made by the Health Committee in its fifth report on the regulation of private and other independent health care. Reference was made to a cooling-off period, and evidence clearly showed that people who paid in advance, before seeing the surgeon who was to carry out the work, could not recover that payment. Consumers of double glazing and life insurance seem to have greater protection than those who undergo major surgery. It was also recommended that it should be mandatory for information on outcomes to be available to those who contemplate surgery.

My final plea is that the Government should address the issue of the control mechanism and the complaints system. There should be a single route for complaints. Many people who work in the private sector also hold national health service contracts, and many of the things that go wrong in the private sector become the responsibility of the NHS. It is ridiculous to talk about setting up two complaints systems—one through the ombudsman and the other through a private sector-funded ombudsman. I would much prefer the people of this country to have the protection of a competent regulatory body and access to an efficient complaints investigation system, irrespective of whether complaints or mishaps occur within the national health service or the private sector.

A useful contribution to the debate has been made this morning, and I hope that the Minister will be able to take these issues forward. Unlike the hon. Member for Cynon Valley, I do not think that her requests for Government action were unreasonable. Indeed, all of them should be implemented.

10.29 am

Mrs. Caroline Spelman (Meriden): I begin by congratulating the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Ann Clwyd) on securing the debate. All hon. Members will have constituents who have had bad experiences that they could recount, and it was doubtless deemed that, because the subject is familiar to other hon. Members, it would make a good one-and-a-half-hour Adjournment debate. It is unfortunate that more hon. Members are not present to give those examples, but the hon. Lady raised many cases—almost horror stories—of what is happening in cosmetic surgery.

The debate is important against the background of the increasing popularity of cosmetic surgery. According to a recent survey by a women's magazine, there has been a 50 per cent. increase in cosmetic surgery in this country during the past five years. For all the bad examples that have been given, more and more people are undergoing such treatments. It is estimated that almost £160 million is spent on cosmetic surgery in this country. This is a good opportunity to raise specific cases, but we also want to speak on behalf of many people who have had adverse results and no satisfaction in trying to sort them out.

One of the underlying problems is how to define cosmetic surgery and I shall be interested to hear how the Minister does so. The more I looked into the matter, the more difficult it became to draw the line. Many procedures now are carried out on the margin of medical treatment. Can cosmetic surgery be defined as an invasive procedure that requires local or general anaesthesia? What about procedures such as dermabrasion which involves neither, but may cause damage? We need a definition of cosmetic surgery so that we can try to provide better protection for patients.

In February this year, the Secretary of State for Health referred to the key purpose of the General Medical Council and stated:

> The GMC must genuinely exist to protect patients. It must be truly accountable and it must be guided at all times by the welfare and safety of patients.—[Official Report, 1 February 2000; Vol. 343, c. 908.]

We have heard today that public confidence is being undermined by well-publicised cases about which multiple complaints have been received by the GMC, but the investigation of those complaints takes a long time, during which the person under investigation is allowed to continue to practise. We understand the importance of self-regulation in health matters, but public confidence must be maintained in the self-regulation of professions. If more such cases come to public attention, the tolerance of the public and the users of health services will diminish.

The examples that have been given reveal the sad fact that cosmetic surgery seems to attract some dubious practitioners. That is not confined to the United Kingdom and there are horror stories from around the world. There are clear anomalies in this country and it is the Government's responsibility to try to sort them out. For example, a doctor suspended from working in the NHS can continue to practise in the private sector. Surely that cannot be right.

Another issue concerns protection of title. It is clear that one problem with cosmetic surgery is that a patient may be seeing a consultant who is more a consultant in name than what we understand to be a medical consultant. The hard sell to which the hon. Member for Cynon Valley referred may come from someone without medical qualifications. There is an issue concerning the words "cosmetic surgeon".

There will be an opportunity shortly during the debate on the Care Standards Bill, to define medical nursing and other titles as a vital protection for the public. Does the Minister agree that such an opportunity exists? I urge him to be cautious on the question of protection of title. I am sure that he knows that protection of title was sought for professions allied to medicine under the Health Act 1999. The consensus among some of those professions is that the provisions do not work well. In an effort to protect patients from so-called cosmetic surgeons, the incorrect use of that title should be avoided, but we need assurances that some of the mistakes learned from dealings with professions allied to medicine can be avoided.

There is no doubt that better regulation is required for cosmetic surgery. The hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Dr. Brand) referred to the Health Committee report, in which there are several good recommendations. I would be interested to hear the Government's opinion of some of them. I endorse the hon. Gentleman's view that a 14-day cooling-off period for cosmetic surgery would be wise before someone signs up for an operation, given that it would be a non-urgent procedure.

I also draw attention to the Health Committee's recommendation that health warnings should be given on cosmetic surgery advertisements. Perhaps that would be a way around the fact that the Advertising Standards Authority is proving ineffective on the subject. The British Medical Association supports that recommendation.

Another important recommendation was that warnings should be given to patients of the risk of being treated by a doctor who does not have access to their records. That is common in cosmetic surgery and applies to other health care issues. If followed, the recommendation might help to prevent disastrous examples such as those given by the hon. Member for Cynon Valley. I look forward to hearing the Minister's views on that and on how legislation could be toughened to deal with the misleading advertisements for cosmetic surgery.

The timing of the debate is useful in that the Care Standards Bill, which should provide an opportunity to improve regulation for cosmetic surgery, is returning from another place. Clause 2(7) of the amended Bill mentions cosmetic surgery, so it is beyond doubt that the Bill deals with such surgery. My reading of the Bill is that it creates an option to ensure that the same safeguards as protect patients in the public sector apply in the private sector. Does the Minister accept that there is reduced resistance in the Government to the idea that the private sector should be regulated on a level playing field? There is no resistance from the independent health care sector to that change of attitude. The chief executive of the Independent Healthcare Association said:

> A single, level regulatory playing field is essential to poorly regulated sectors.

After the debate, there can be no doubt that cosmetic surgery is one such sector.

Does the Minister acknowledge that it is important that inspection standards for independent health care establishments are consistent with those applied to NHS hospitals? That is both important and practical. The inspectorate that will be set up following the Care Standards Bill will at some date result in a good level of expertise. After a couple of years of carrying out inspections of publicly owned establishments, the team of inspectors' level of expertise could be usefully applied to private sector inspections. I urge the Minister to ensure consistency across both types of establishment, as it would be beneficial.

In the debate in the House of Lords on the Care Standards Bill, Lord Laming pointed out that > wherever people receive healthcare treatment the standards of regulation and inspection should be the same.—[Official Report, House of Lords, 10 January 2000; Vol. 608, c. 417.]

I concur with that view. In the debate, several noble Lords observed that the NHS is increasingly using independent provision in a wide range of ways, for recuperation, rehabilitation, or because of insufficient provision in the NHS. Regulation and inspection must therefore cover both. As the hon. Member for Isle of Wight said, the extent of contracting out to the private sector in cosmetic surgery would make common coverage even more of an imperative.

As a result of the amendments made in the House of Lords, the new National Care Standards Commission will be able to contract with the Commission for Health Improvement to carry out on its behalf inspections of private and voluntary establishments. In practice, will experienced inspectors enter both types of establishment?

Having read clauses 2 and 21 of the amended Bill, I am slightly worried. The treatment of the lady who found herself in a dentist's chair rather than on a proper operating table and suffered accordingly took place in a ground-floor office. The establishments in which cosmetic surgery is carried out are diverse. Will the Bill cover such establishments? It is not beyond the wit of man to imagine that some cosmetic surgeons may work in a home setting. Will the Bill extend to cosmetic surgery treatments in a domiciliary setting? That may be another loophole that we must try to close if we are trying to prevent more accidents.

It has been important to have this debate. Clearly, many vulnerable people have had poor experiences, and we as politicians should try to see what could be done under existing law or proposed new law to tighten up and provide proper protection for patients who undergo cosmetic surgery. I realise that the Care Standards Bill is betwixt and between another place and this place, but I should be interested to hear what scope the Minister believes legislation offers in providing a level of protection that is currently lacking.

10.42 am

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Hutton): Like other hon. Members, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Ann Clwyd) on having chosen this subject for today's debate. She made the important point that tens of thousands of cosmetic procedures are performed in this country every year, so it is clearly big business. Parliament must ensure that it is properly regulated and that the public are properly protected. It is clear from what my hon. Friend has been saying for a long time that there is room for considerable improvement in both those areas, and I shall explain what the Government are doing.

As I am sure the House is aware, my hon. Friend has a long-established interest in this important subject, and has campaigned long and hard for better protection and higher standards. In 1994, she introduced a private Member's Bill to establish registration procedures for cosmetic surgeons in order to set minimum standards of training and practice. She followed that by bringing to the House's attention on several occasions her anxieties about doctors who work privately as cosmetic surgeons but do not necessarily have either the expertise or the experience to perform such operations. The House owes her thanks for ensuring that these matters are raised.

I assure my hon. Friend that the Government take the issues involved extremely seriously. We accept her view that the public need greater assurance on the safety and quality of such treatment. I am sure that she will be glad to know that we are therefore introducing, in the Care Standards Bill, improved regulation of independent health care services, including premises where cosmetic surgery, medical treatment under anaesthesia or sedation and certain laser treatment is provided.

The hon. Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman) asked whether the Bill would be sufficiently flexible to cover a variety of circumstances and places where private cosmetic surgery is performed. It will be. The Bill has been constructed to ensure that many of the detailed powers can be dealt with through regulation, which will allow us to respond as and when situations arise. We do not want to repeat some of the mistakes of the past, when the regulatory framework was too inflexible, and did not take account of people's desire to find a way around, and through, the regulatory net.

We do not often have the opportunity to correct such problems, but the Care Standards Bill provides it. The Government—and, I am sure, my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley—want to make sure that the legislation is comprehensive and flexible, and can adapt to changing medical practice in the future or a desire on the part of some practitioners to find a way through the system. I hope that the Bill will address my hon. Friend's concerns. If she has further concerns, they can be addressed by tabling amendments in Standing Committee, which will provide an opportunity for more detailed discussion.

In addition to the legislation, the Government are working closely with the GMC to improve, strengthen and modernise the regulation of medical practitioners, whether in the public or private sectors. My hon. Friend will be aware that the vast majority of cosmetic surgery is carried out in the private sector. Arrangements for regulating private sector health care are long-standing, and are based on the Registered Homes Act 1984. We recognise the weaknesses in those arrangements, as she has done. For instance, they concentrate on facilities and equipment, do not address health care quality issues adequately and do not provide satisfactory access to redress for patients who are dissatisfied with the health care that they have received. We aim to achieve more effective regulation to ensure quality of private cosmetic surgery, adequacy of information for patients and would-be patients–all hon. Members who have spoken have addressed their concerns in that regard—safety of technology and equipment used, including laser treatment equipment, and effectiveness of complaints procedures when, sadly, things go wrong.

The Care Standards Bill will establish a new regulatory body for care homes and independent health care—the National Care Standards Commission. The commission will have the powers to inspect and, if necessary, shut down cosmetic surgery clinics that do not meet the rigorous standards that will be put in place. The starting point for the new regulatory system for independent health care is that those who operate private hospitals and clinics should be accountable for all aspects of care—clinical and non-clinical services—undertaken inside them. For hospitals, that includes the work of doctors to whom they grant admitting rights. The hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Dr. Brand) referred to that concern, which is perfectly valid, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley.

It is not acceptable for private clinics, hospital owners and managers to seek to wash their hands of their responsibilities on the ground that consultants are not employed by them, but have a private contract with their patients. The hon. Member for Isle of Wight will be aware that one of the most effective ways to address that issue is to make sure that private hospitals have proper complaints procedures in place. Ultimately, the operation of those complaints procedures will be tied to registration. Therefore, if clear evidence exists of poor practice within a private clinic, action can be taken to shut the place down, even if privately or self-employed consultants conducted the procedures. We must not have a system in which people shuffle off their responsibilities, pass the buck and blame others, while continuing to provide a poor service. That will not happen under the new arrangements for which we intend to legislate.

We shall also set up tough national minimum standards for private hospitals and clinics. That work will be developed through wide-ranging consultation, which will include the independent health care sector. Clearly, standards will need to be sensitive to the type of care that is being provided—they will differ between, for example, hospitals providing acute surgical care and those treating people with mental health problems. Our guiding light throughout the exercise will be patient safety.

We will therefore require all private hospitals and clinics to have proper arrangements in place to assure quality. Those will include proper treatment protocols, arrangements for clinical audit, proper maintenance of clinical records, systems for clinical risk management, arrangements for reporting untoward incidents to hospital management, and so on. All health professionals working in a hospital should participate in those arrangements. Private hospitals will need to put proper arrangements in place to oversee those systems, for example by using medical advisory committees. However, the hospital manager and owners will have the ultimate responsibility of ensuring that the hospital provides high-quality clinical care.

We will develop standards for independent health care by involving the relevant experts in the field. Our consultation on the development of standards for cosmetic surgery will also involve the Medical Devices Agency. Its views, expertise and professional contacts on, for example, the use of lasers, silicone breast implants—which concern my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley—and devices used for liposuction will be essential in producing effective standards. We will also require private hospitals and clinics to have proper procedures in place to check the qualifications of the staff whom they employ and to ensure that they employ only state-registered staff in relevant posts, for example as physiotherapists.

However, the process does not end there. As part of our minimum standards, we want to ensure that staff have the appropriate skills and qualifications for the work that they undertake; for example, the employment of paediatric nursing staff to look after children will be a vital requirement in ensuring that there is proper 24-hour medical cover in place where hospitals carry out major surgery.

Standards will also cover the qualifications of all health care professionals involved in cosmetic surgery. Clinics where cosmetic surgery is performed will have to satisfy the National Care Standards Commission that surgeons who operate in them have the relevant qualifications and have reached consultant status. That will help to ensure that patients have increased protection from surgeons who are not adequately experienced or skilled in cosmetic surgery. We are also determined to put a stop to the practice of doctors continuing to work in the private sector when they have been suspended from their NHS work because they pose a risk to patients. All hon. Members who spoke in the debate have expressed their concerns about that. The current alert letter system has not always worked as effectively as we had hoped and we will work with the GMC and other bodies to establish better arrangements.

We recognise the difficulties that patients sometimes face when cosmetic surgery, or indeed any private health care treatment, goes wrong, and they try to seek redress. Patients can be faced with the surgeon and the hospital passing the buck, with neither accepting responsibility. That is simply not good enough. Under the new regulatory system, each hospital and clinic will be required to have a formal complaints procedure; that is not at present a formal or legal requirement. Patients will be able to make a complaint about their treatment and have it fully investigated. If they are not satisfied with the response that they receive, they will be able to raise the matter directly with the National Care Standards Commission, which will have considerable powers at its disposal. It will be able to ensure that all staff who work at the hospital or the clinic co-operate in those complaints investigations. If necessary, it will report poor or unethical practice directly to the GMC, under the fitness-to-practise procedures, where matters can be further investigated. If standards are persistently poor, the clinic can be closed down and will not be allowed to open in the next town, as can sometimes occur under the present arrangements.

Compared with the current system, in which 100 different health authority inspection units are involved, the position of the National Care Standards Commission as a single regulator will give it the necessary overview and co-ordination to apply that type of sanction effectively. Those who pose a risk to the public must not be allowed to slip through the regulatory net. In tackling those issues through the Care Standards Bill, we are confident that the measures we will introduce will provide the enhanced safeguards and assurance of standards in independent health care, including cosmetic surgery, that the public fully deserve.

The hon. Member for Isle of Wight raised concerns about the difference, as he saw it, between the arrangements that we are putting in place for the private health care sector and the national health service. I believe that he was wrong in several respects; I do not want to pick him up too much on that, but I will make two points. He was concerned about clinical governance arrangements. In relation to NHS patients being treated in the private sector, the same safeguards and procedures will apply. The Commission for Health Improvement will be able to follow the progress of those patients and the standard of care that they received. We expect medical practitioners in the private health care sector, when treating NHS patients, to apply exactly the same standards of clinical governance as they would apply to patients when treating them under the national health service. The hon. Gentleman may have inadvertently misunderstood the arrangements in those two respects.

Dr. Brand: Surely the Minister has just illustrated my point. It would be more sensible to have a common framework for clinical governance, whether for a private patient within an NHS hospital, an NHS patient in a private hospital or a private patient in a private hospital.

Mr. Hutton: The hon. Gentleman was saying that we were abandoning NHS patients in the private sector and exposing them to no effective safeguards. That is not the case. There is a logical argument for separating the role of the Commission for Health Improvement from the role of the National Care Standards Commission. The Commission for Health Improvement will not be a registration body; it will be an inspection body. The National Care Standards Commission will have both functions in relation to the private sector, which is a reasonable place at which to draw the line. The problem with legislation is where to draw the lines, define functions and separate one organisation's responsibilities from those of another. That is an inescapable part of the whole process of providing an effective regulatory framework.

The system will be flexible and, when we have amended the Care Standards Bill, the National Care Standards Commission will be able to use the expertise of the Commission for Health Improvement in carrying out certain inspection functions in relation to the private, acute health care sector. There is every possibility that we can ensure that the two separate organisations work closely together and advance the interests of patients in the way that we have always intended.

I have outlined the many improvements that will drive up the standards of private health care to a much higher standard. It is important to be aware that that work does not stand alone. The potential of the National Care Standards Commission cannot be met unless the regulation of the professions is thoroughly modernised. My hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley expressed her serious concerns about such issues. To that end, the Government are currently working closely with the GMC to bring about the necessary changes that she and others have long called for.

As my hon. Friend will be aware, the GMC has, by law, several specific functions such as keeping up-to-date registers of all qualified doctors, fostering good medical practice, promoting high standards of medical education and dealing with doctors whose fitness to practise is in doubt. The tragic events surrounding the Shipman case have most recently brought that last area into focus. The case highlighted beyond any reasonable doubt that the powers currently available to the GMC to impose interim suspension or place interim conditions on a doctor while cases are being investigated are inadequate under the current procedures. There is common consent about that. It is important to understand that that relates to all practising doctors, not only those who specialise in plastic surgery.

Currently, the preliminary proceedings committee of the GMC can impose interim suspension on a doctor's registration, but only after it has decided to refer the case to the professional conduct committee. The process, which is set out in regulations, requires a doctor to be given a minimum of 28 days' notice in which to respond—to which my hon. Friend referred. In reality, the delay may be eight weeks or more. Such a delay is not acceptable. Those various gaps and loopholes mean that doctors who may be a danger to patients can continue to practice. That is clearly unacceptable. It is certainly not in the public interest, which is why we have decided to take action.

We are giving the GMC additional powers to impose interim suspensions. We also intend to give practical meaning to the presumption that, when a doctor is struck off, it is for life—save in the most exceptional circumstances. Speed is vital to those powers. We shall use them to impose interim suspension or conditions quickly in any circumstance, including cases of performance and health. Importantly, the new power could be used at any point in the fitness-to-practise procedure. It would give the GMC similar flexibility to the United Kingdom Central Council for Nursing, Midwifery and Health Visiting in the timing of the imposition of interim conditions.

There are many other issues that I would have liked to discuss but, sadly, I have run out of time. There is no argument about what we want to achieve. We want private hospitals and other independent health care facilities to work to proper modern standards of health care. We want those hospitals to be accountable to their customers for the services that they provide, and to be subjected to the most rigorous and demanding checks to ensure that they meet the necessary requirements. That will be the case in future.

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): It gives me tremendous pleasure to start this debate. Often, in the House, we are accused of talking a lot and getting little done, because we are into adversarial politics. Today's debate is different: it marks an important event that has arisen from an Adjournment debate that took place nearly two years ago. Today sees the launch of the Year Out Group, which will promote a structured year out for school leavers before they go to university or start a job, and for those who choose to take the year out between university and a job.

In setting up the Year Out Group, we have had assistance from the Department for Education and Employment, including from the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Barking (Ms Hodge). We have also had support from the Universities and Colleges Admissions Service, which plays an important role in the decisions of school leavers. The purpose of our group is to encourage more school leavers to defer for a year their entry to university, or their commencement of whatever they choose to do with their lives. A year out can be a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity for people's personal development; it can enable them to contribute to society and help to ensure that they set the right course for the following few years.

Following our Adjournment debate, I formed a working party of the seven leading organisations that I could identify working in the sector. The advice and knowledge that they made available brought in others, and the Year Out Group now comprises 20 bodies, including voluntary organisations that offer work opportunities, principally overseas; organisations that offer teaching opportunities overseas and in this country; and organisations that enable self-development through adventure programmes, such as treks across the Sahara.

Eighteen-year-olds and 19-year-olds face a range of options when they leave school; different ones are appropriate to different individuals, but, in the end, the individual must choose. That is why the focus of our debate two years ago was on the need for guidelines. The sector is burgeoning: in the past two years, the number of organisations offering a year-out experience to school leavers has grown by 50 per cent., to nearly 200. However, little guidance has been available that might encourage and steer students, helped by their families and teachers, to make the right choices.

I want to make a distinction between those who take an unplanned year out and those who take a planned and structured one. We are talking not about years off, but about year-out programmes devised by organisations that are committed to providing the best once-in-a-lifetime opportunities for students and young people. After its launch, the Year Out Group will be open to other organisations that meet its criteria and aspire to its six aims.

The group's first aim is to promote the concept of the year out, about which I shall say more in a moment. The second is to provide accurate information that will become a focal point for those who want to find out about the different organisations and the range of opportunities available to school leavers.

Thirdly, it is increasingly evident that a quality framework should be applied to the provision of year-out opportunities; until recently, the sector has been self-regulating. The Year Out Group has not yet provided such a framework: its focus has been on providing guidelines to help people to choose between the many organisations that are available–I shall give examples of some of the very good organisations that are not yet members of the group later. However, people should know what they are looking for, and our group aims to provide a quality framework.

Fourthly, there was until recently a sense of rugged individualism about organisations in the sector–an attitude that may, to some extent, have been spawned by the nature of the people who set them up. The Year Out Group has proved that those working in the sector can co-operate and that their organisations have a mutual interest in working together Fifthly, it was made clear on several occasions during the past few years that the Government and major organisations had not caught up with developments in the sector. There was a need for a voice to speak collectively for year-out organisations. To achieve that, the group's sixth aim is to represent the whole sector equally and impartially.

I have described the group's aims, which are very ambitious. The group has clearly set out what type of organisation should belong to it: it wants to attract organisations whose principal activities include the provision of high-quality, structured programmes in the United Kingdom or overseas for young people who take time out. Such programmes include cultural exchanges, educational courses, expeditions, volunteer work and structured work placements, but exclude ordinary paid employment and the au pair scheme. In addition, members of the Year Out Group should be required to aspire to all of its aims.

The sector is about to achieve an important landmark. So far, its main achievement has been to agree guidelines to which all of its members can sign up. Today, the Minister will today launch those guidelines—we are grateful for her support—and, at the same time, the Year Out Group's website will be launched. It should be available online this morning at www.yearoutgroup.org. The website contains guidelines which are also available in a leaflet that will be sent to schools around the country and can also be obtained from participating organisations.

Students who are considering taking a year out should first look long and hard at the way in which they will be selected: they should establish what sort of person the organisation wants, and whether they will be properly assessed. It is no good ending up on a project on the other side of the world if one is simply not suited to it, or if one has been insufficiently trained and prepared.

Secondly, it is a good idea to establish who will benefit from the activity. A prime purpose of a year out must be that students themselves will benefit, and the best organisations do all they can to ensure that, at the end of the programme, participants feel that they have made a real contribution to the scheme, project or programme with which they have been involved.

To achieve that, the third thing that students need to examine is precisely how they will spend their time. It is no good going on a programme to an exciting and exotic country if too much time is spent performing menial tasks that do not exploit the potential that even 18 or 19-year-olds have to offer. Tapping that potential not only helps their self-development, but contributes to the development of the place in which they work.

Finally, with such a wide range of organisations—around 200—offering so many opportunities, students must look at the cost of the programme that they intend to go on, at any hidden extras and at the organisation itself. The group felt that it was worth emphasising the importance of the arrangements made before students set out on a programme, for example, they should ask who is responsible for getting them to the site of their designated programme.

Young people should also look at safety procedures and at the support that they will receive in the field. It may be the first time that some of them have left home for an extended period; for such people, an element of pastoral care adds a great deal of value to the programme, and they may wish to ensure that the organisation that they are going with can provide that. Others will welcome the chance to break away from parental ties, considering that they are old enough to look after themselves. Again, it is the student's choice, in consultation with family and school.

Last, but not least, and especially relevant to those who go on a longer placement lasting six months to a year, is the question of readjustment when they come back and start on their university course or long-term career. It is important that the right debriefing arrangements are in place. To have an extended period away from home can be an exciting and exhilarating experience, but students need to land on their feet and readjust to the world of home or work, or to the academic world that many of them intend to enter next.

It is a credit to the success of many organisations today that the attitude of universities to a year out has changed significantly. For a long time, a gap year between school and university was regarded as a bolt-on extra for middle-class kids who could afford it and who spent their time enjoying themselves. Their tutors hoped that, when they went up to university, they would remember enough of what they had learned at school and would have enough commitment to get through the course. Far be it from me to suggest that that applies to any Member of Parliament, although in the two debates that I have attended on this subject, I have learned that many hon. Members took advantage of a gap year.

More seriously, we now recognise that students who take structured and planned time out before they go to university are better equipped to focus on their course; they have the social skills needed to engage with other students, and they acclimatise well to an environment that is extremely difficult from what they have been used to at school. Indeed, a survey undertaken by the Year Out Group in February this year found that, although all universities noted a higher pre-course drop-out rate among students who take a year out, there is a great deal of evidence suggesting that students who have taken a year out and remain committed to their course have a much lower drop-out rate. The extra year to think about the course that they intend to follow makes it more likely that the majority who take up their place at university will complete it successfully. In the modern world, in which students have to pay so much of the cost of their course, it is important that they go up to university confident that they have made the right decision.

We asked the vice-chancellors of the 50 leading universities in a survey whether they agreed that a structured year out benefits the personal development of a typical undergraduate: 93 per cent. of those who responded—almost all did—agreed with that statement. As a member of the Select Committee on Education and Employment, I have had many opportunities to ask vice-chancellors for their views on the year out, and I have found near unanimity in their endorsement of the benefits of a planned year out. Last September, the Committee took evidence from UCAS, and I asked Mr. Tony Higgins, the head of UCAS, whether the drop-out rate among those who had taken a year out was higher than among the university population as a whole. He replied:

> No, the evidence is to the contrary . . . these are people who are going for their places when they are a little bit older, a bit more experienced and they have done what they really want to do.

UCAS has also stated:

> Voluntary work is almost certainly worth an A-level grade or two in college selectors' eyes.

Of course, the Year out Group is not only concerned with voluntary work, although that is an important dimension of the whole sector.

There has clearly been a change in attitude. Last year, 50,000 of those going up to university—that is 16 per cent. of those placed on university courses—did not have a place set aside for them before they took their A-level examinations. It would be preferable if as many such students as possible planned to defer their entry rather than, for example, on finding that their A-level results were better than expected, ringing UCAS—or, increasingly, contacting it through its website—to find out at a late stage what university opportunities were available.

A change in universities' attitude opens up a new dimension—a way ahead. The concept of widening access by taking advantage of the year out needs to be promoted. Many children from less well-off backgrounds have not even heard of taking a year out. As a member of the Education and Employment Committee, I visit many secondary schools; a typical comment from head teachers at such schools is that the children there would not appreciate or be able to cope with going abroad for an extended period. That is not nearly ambitious enough for those children. I am sure that, with the right support and development, most could make a great success of a year out.

Changes in attitude have led to Voluntary Service Overseas beginning, in a modest way, to take school leavers from disadvantaged backgrounds and put them in year-out programmes with support from the Department for International Development. At this stage, the programme is very small, involving only a handful of students—fewer than 50 or 100 a year—but it demonstrates the potential.

The YMCA in my constituency, Guildford, is involved in a project in Sri Lanka. It sends people from less well-off backgrounds out there for up to a year to assist in a home. In addition, that YMCA branch, along with others, has gap-year opportunities within its organisation, enabling those taking a year out to help to run its hostels. In addition, people who have problems can be helped by having someone of their own age to help them deal with them and set them on the road ahead. The Prince's Trust is also beginning to play a much bigger role in this field.

Enabling school leavers from less well-off backgrounds to maximise such opportunities raises the issue of funding. Many of the organisations that are part of our group help students to raise money. Some are charities and have long experience of helping those whom they sponsor to obtain additional sponsorship from the private sector; many large companies have an outstanding record of supporting students on year-out programmes. In the long term, however, an element of funding from Government sources is bound to be necessary if the year out is to become a fully recognised part of the strategy for widening access.

How will children benefit? First, those coming from families that are not accustomed to their children going to university will find it much easier to justify that important decision to those around them if they already have their qualifications under their arm before going to university. Secondly, during their year out, they will, no doubt, want to save up some money to help them on their way when they reach university. It is important that they do not do that by taking a job in McDonald's and spending a year as a workhorse: they should spend time doing work—perhaps teaching or social work—that enables them to achieve more in terms of personal development and gives them a certain amount of personal responsibility. The evidence shows that, when they go up to university, they will have a great deal more to offer and better social skills, and so will be able to make the best and most successful use of their chosen course of study.

The most important point is that children are undertaking post-qualification entry to courses. I am a great believer in post-qualification entry, and increasing numbers of universities share that view. For example, Surrey university, which is in my constituency, has told me that > a move to a 100 per cent. post-A-level entry scheme would improve student choice and therefore retention, as well as reducing admission costs, tensions, and errors.

Of course, that view is not universal—a significant number of universities are opposed to students on certain kinds of courses breaking their periods of study with a year out. However, there is a growing will for change. The length of the timetable proposed by the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals for developing post-qualification entry disappointed many in the university world.

There is a case for saying that a target number of school leavers should be positively encouraged to take a year out, and that support for them to do so should be made available. The arrival of the Year Out Group, with its agenda of guidelines and a quality framework, will make such a policy shift much easier to achieve.

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon): I do not disagree with the merits of the year out, as explained by the hon. Gentleman in his fascinating presentation. However, post-qualification application for university could also be achieved by reforming the A-level system so that is more like the American system, which bases university applications on grade point averages, instead of all-or-nothing A-levels at the end of the sixth form. That would also achieve the hon. Gentleman's aims. Would he consider it, regardless of the merits of the year out?

Mr. St. Aubyn: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, and hope that we shall hear more of his thoughts in the debate. Clearly, there are alternatives to A-levels. However, the point is that a break between school and university is a valuable addition to the development of individuals. It also gets around one of the key concerns about A-levels, without undermining their status as the gold standard of academic achievement. There may be students for whom an American-style gradation system is appropriate, but I should point out that a four-year course—not a three-year course—is the norm in the United States; and only by the end of their first university year have students attained in their chosen subject the same level of ability and knowledge that is attained by many A-level students in this country.

I move from the funding issue to the quality framework agenda. As I said, the Year Out Group aspires to build such a framework. We recognise that some very good organisations are not part of the group, and we hope that they will join in due course. We are not saying that those who form part of the group have adhered to a quality framework, although they were required to answer questions based on the guidelines that we are promoting today. Nevertheless, such a framework is a precondition for significant Government funding, and it would have to tackle the difficult question of health and safety.

Firms in this country know that health and safety issues can create difficulties. In respect of school leavers, particularly those on programmes abroad, such issues create major challenges for organisations. However, all those who have left school are at greater risk than when at school: they are safer in the school environment and in the protection of their families than when they first go out into the world and stand on their own two feet. We must accept that, at that point in our lives, we are all a little more at risk, so we should not overplay the occasional tragedy of the school leaver who has an accident overseas. Sad as such incidents are, they frequently involve those who chose not to go through an organisation and instead took a risk on their own. However, it is clear that, if we are to deliver a quality framework, the health and safety issue must be examined and the personal development of individual students properly addressed. Moreover, assessment in respect of the programme in which students participate and achievements arising from their experiences must be properly measured.

I am delighted by the interest that has been shown in this subject. Many hon. Members have told me that they are pleased with developments in the sector. There is broad support for those developments, which is reflected in the consensus that we appear to have achieved in the Chamber today.

We live in a fast-changing world. I have yet to mention the internet, which will play an important role in this area. Hon. Members may know that, within the next two years, school leavers will apply for university places almost exclusively through the UCAS website.

[Mr. St. Aubyn]

The heavy document through which some of us remember wading many years ago is disappearing. Through the website, students will be able to discover where a particular course is available and where other students on their course come from. Indeed, a wide range of other information will also be available.

We hope that the link between UCAS and the Year Out Group websites will enable students to discover the benefits of a year out. Should they choose to take a year out before going to university, they will able to keep in touch with their family and prospective university through the web. As a result of the web revolution, the world is shrinking. Increasing numbers of students can say, "Although I will be on the other side of the world if I take this opportunity, I will be able to keep in touch with mum and dad by exchanging e-mails every day of the week, if we feel like it." In the modern world, we can take the big step away from our home environment, yet stay in closer touch than ever.

Given that students are now made to pay so much more of the cost of their period at university, more of them will choose to go to a university near to their home. The chance to take a year out before doing that would offer such students the breadth of experience and opportunity to mature that a previous generation got from going to a university on the other side of the country. There are many advantages in the traditional British system, in which students are encouraged to go to a university far away from home. However, as the Dearing report made clear, it is not the function of Government to use taxpayers' money to promote that. Students who choose, for financial reasons, to go to their local university or to follow a remote learning course will ask themselves, "How can I show that I am growing up, now that I have left school?" The opportunity to take a year out on a structured programme, with its responsibilities and challenges, will appeal to a wide range of school leavers. The developments that I have mentioned, which have been so well supported by all those with an interest in the matter, are exciting opportunities that will be available to to all future school leavers.

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): My hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) said that we were acting in a non-adversarial capacity. I hope that you cannot see it, Mr. Cook, but I have brought my mackintosh.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Frank Cook): Order. It might be helpful to all right hon. and hon. Members if I remind them that, in its decision to establish proceedings in the Chamber, the House deemed that it was not a Committee and insisted that the Chair be addressed as Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Brooke: I do apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have spoken twice in this Chamber, but the circumstances surrounding my presence today—which I shall, in a moment, reveal—are in part responsible for my being perhaps not totally in control of my conduct. I hope, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that you cannot see it, but, partly due to those circumstances, I have brought into the Chamber a mackintosh that would be more suitable for a county cricket ground than a legislative chamber. I hope that it is invisible.

I was in Northern Ireland yesterday and was invited to participate in today's debate only one hour before it began. That is why I am still in the process of collecting myself. My speech will, necessarily, draw more on personal insight than on the results of burning the midnight oil. With apologies to the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris) I shall cite again the case of the Liberal peer, the publication of whose memoirs was held up for three weeks because the printers had run out of the letter "I". My speech, too, will draw heavily on the first person singular.

I suspect, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that you, like me, did national service. That particular form of gap year—indeed, gap two years—had a significant influence on my later life, but it has not been available since the late 1950s. Dr. Alec Dickson—and, in the United States, the Peace Corps—introduced the concept of a gap year into the lives of young people. My own links with Dr. Dickson came about through the legendary Launcelot Fleming, chaplain and dean at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, then Bishop of Portsmouth, Bishop of Norwich and Dean of Windsor.

Fleming took a first-class degree in geology at Cambridge and a Master's degree at Yale. His Fellowship at Yale obliged him to travel throughout the United States, at which time he had the sort of experiences that we are discussing. However, his most formative experience occurred in a rather late gap year—an expedition to Graham Land in 1934. For almost two years, he was both geologist and chaplain to the expedition. He said that there was no greater test for a clergyman than to be shut up with his contemporaries for six months each winter, during which time they could test to destruction his faith and the arguments that lay behind it. Because of his background, he was a massive supporter of Outward Bound, which was a national forerunner of the organisations that we are discussing. He was also involved in the World College movement, and took a leading part in the developments mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Guildford. I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing the debate—despite the circumstances in which I entered it—and on initiating the process two years ago.

My younger sister was doing VSO in Nigeria when the Biafran war broke out. She was in Onitsha, which was at one end of the bridge that separated the warring parties, but got out through Port Harcourt. She and the people she was with had to get out, just as people now have to get out of Sierra Leone. She appeared at the home of the economic counsellor in the American embassy, whom she had visited on her way out. He said, "The Americans have a strong tradition of sanctuary, but there is a price. I have to write a telegram to Washington tonight on the subject of the economic situation in the war zone. If you can tell me the price of bread in Onitsha on the day you left, I can construct an entire telegram about that." She said that that would be easy, and was admitted into sanctuary. To her credit, my sister went to Jamaica with VSO after she got her university degree here. She married a Canadian who taught in the same establishment and they have spent their entire adult life working in third-world universities. That stems directly from her original work for VSO.

My eldest son went to Zimbabwe—another country in the headlines—under the auspices of the Project Trust. That organisation is run from a castle on the island of Coll, which, remarkably, it uses as a kind of proxy for the third world—I mean no disrespect to Coll. If you send people out at considerable expense to the four corners of the earth, it is sensible to test whether they have the self-reliance to cope. Those who want to go out with the Project Trust go to the island for a week; they are housed in a croft and perform tasks such as sorting seaweed—at least, that is what happened when my son was there. At the end of the exercise, it is perfectly clear whether somebody will be able to cope with a year in the third world. As 20 per cent. of entrants fail, a great deal of money is saved by that testing process. I have to say that my son greatly enjoyed his year in Zimbabwe.

One of my nephews joined an organisation called GAP, which, as its name implies, operates in the gap-year sector—although it competes with a clothing company. He went out to Paraguay and, somewhat unpredictably, shifted his academic focus from history to Arabic as a result of the experience. He has been in Egypt and Yemen, and would have gone to Iran, had there not been prolonged visa difficulties. His twin brother also intended to read history at university but, after going to Japan, he devoted his career to reading Japanese. I cite those two anecdotes because of the German ambassador's observations on the "Today" programme this morning: he said that the British were not learning languages as they should. I can tell him that the gap-year process has altered the careers of people close to me in an immensely productive way.

My hon. Friend the Member for Guildford spoke about a structured programme and guidelines that could be universally applied to participants. I will not spend a lot of time on that subject, not least because of the circumstances in which I entered the debate. Suffice it to say, an 18th-century Member of Parliament, after a long speech by Edmund Burke, got up and said, "Ditto to Mr. Burke." Like that hon. Member, I support the views expressed by my hon. Friend. I am delighted that the programme will be launched—perhaps later today, or in the near future—at the Greycoat Hospital school in the heart of my constituency; I can think of no better location.

Organisations such as Project Trust, GAP and the former Operation Raleigh, on which I worked with Colonel Blashford-Snell when I was a Minister, place a heavy obligation on participants to raise the money themselves. The pattern is that half the participants come from the maintained sector and half from the independent sector. Under the previous Government—I do not address this remark to the Minister—anxiety was expressed about offering VSO experience to people before university, rather than, as had previously been the case, to people who already had qualifications and were fully trained. In providing financial assistance for younger students, the Government might disadvantage people who participate on an entirely voluntary basis and have to raise all the money themselves. It would be helpful if the Minister could comment on the financial assistance that the Government give to VSO and other schemes.

You have been extremely indulgent, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I apologise for having addressed you incorrectly, and am delighted that you brought me up so short.

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon): We all enjoyed that brief speech by the right hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Brooke). I note his point about the dangers of dwelling on personal experience and I shall resist the temptation to do so.

The hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) made an interesting speech. I congratulate him on his persistence in requesting a debate and, in the Education and Employment Committee, promoting at every opportunity today's launch and the concept of the gap year. He made several interesting points, with many of which I agree. To save time, I shall concentrate on four aspects in which there is room to explore.

The first aspect is equity between people from less well-off backgrounds and, to use the stereotypical term, "rich kids". That term is unfair to them, but it is understood by many to mean those who can take advantage of opportunities such as gap years. The second aspect is whether the gap year should be used as a substitute for good early careers guidance. One of the advantages cited is that taking a gap year tends to reduce drop-out rates when people finally reach university; however, it is an unintended advantage and I question whether it is the most efficient way of reducing drop-out rates. The third aspect I want to explore is that of post-qualification application to university, which is often a consequence of taking a gap year; again, I wonder whether there are better ways of encouraging that. The fourth aspect is universities' attitude to gap year students. The hon. Member for Guildford has already spoken about other aspects, including the importance of structure.

Before I discuss those issues, I should like to make it clear that, for all the reasons given by the hon. Gentleman, I believe that a gap year can be very valuable. It can improve socialisation skills and provide a useful breadth of experience before people move on to higher education and intense academic study.

However, in some ways, some of those advantages resulting from gap-year schemes reflect the disappointing results of school education. It is unfortunate if a gap year is necessary to obtain the socialisation skills that are necessary for higher education or employment but that cannot now be obtained—if, indeed, they ever could—from secondary schooling. In employment and higher education, there may be a marked difference between people who have taken a gap year and those who have not in terms of their ability to socialise and get on with things. However, while that points to the advantage of a gap year, it raises questions about the pressures on school staff and students, particularly given the seemingly ever-expanding schools curriculum.

I feel strongly that we do not do as much as we should in terms of foreign language education, although I am wary of recommending that we add more to the curriculum. The right hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster hinted that one advantage of a gap year is that it stimulates the necessary interest in foreign languages, but is that the right approach to take? Some people do not take a gap year because they cannot or do not wish to do so; they should not miss out on something so fundamental to a basic secondary school education as developing an interest, if not skill, in foreign languages.

As the hon. Member for Guildford said, equity is connected to the way in which such programmes are funded. I believe that, if we were to consider the number of young people who take a gap year—some students, others about to enter employment—we would see great inequity in terms of the ability of those from less well-off backgrounds to gain access to that opportunity. The profile would be similar, if not worse, than that of those entering higher education. I should be interested to know whether the relevant statistics exist.

Mr. St. Aubyn: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the real inequality is found in the lack of access to higher education for those from disadvantaged backgrounds? Those who take a year out are not taking the year off; they are putting something back in. Many of them are giving up their time and resources for the purposes of self-development, but that costs them something: they will start their career a year after they would have otherwise have done. The inequality arises, not from finances, but from the education system, and it illustrates precisely the need to widen access to such groups.

Dr. Harris: I think that I understand the hon. Gentleman's argument. If he believes that a gap year is good idea, generally speaking, it should be accessible to all people on an equitable basis. Given the advantages of a gap year, there should be no reason why it should appeal more to people of one social background than to those of another. If we accept that it is a good thing, we should expect proportionate numbers of people from the maintained schools sector, the independent schools sector, social groups ABC1 and other socio-economic groups to take advantage of it.

However, I am sure that that does not happen. The problem is not unique to those taking a gap year and it relates to funding because the courses are self-funded, or sponsorship has to be obtained—unless one is fortunate enough to participate in a scholarship-type arrangement that pays the bulk of the expenses. Therefore, raising the necessary funds will be difficult and daunting for those without access to parental support.

My gap year was based around an English Speaking Union scholarship, granted following an entrance examination, to study at an American high school for the last two terms of that year. It was fully funded and worth a huge amount of money, given the costs of that high school place in the private sector. It was available to me as a student in a state school, but most of the students on the scheme came from independent schools. If funding is to be directed at gap-year schemes, it should be student based—enabling people to be selected according to their access, or lack of access to resources—rather than provided through block grants made to organisations or general subsidies given to everyone on the scheme. That is the way to increase access.

I was pleased to hear the hon. Member for Guildford make a plea for more Government funding. I am sure that the Minister will tell us what the Government are doing now and what more they can do. However, if, to an increasing extent, students have to pay their way through university, there will be implications for their access to a gap year. It will be another year in which they do not earn money, but go further into debt—a year in which they might have to spend their savings or the money that their parents gave them to support them through college. Current funding arrangements have been criticised on the grounds of equitability, especially after the loss of the means-tested grant. Therefore, it is incumbent on hon. Members and Ministers who think the gap year a good idea to say how they would ensure that access to the gap year is improved. They must deal with the fact that new student support arrangements, whatever their advantages, will act as a disincentive to spending another year not earning. Broadening the gap-year experience will be difficult, given those arrangements.

In passing, it is worth noting that our discussion has covered the gap year taken before entering higher education or employment. The hon. Member for Guildford and I have both been guilty of talking only about students; we should also mention those young people who may not be deferring entry to university or employment. We have also failed to mention the group of people who take a gap year between higher education and entering employment. I suspect that that group, whatever the figures are historically, will come to represent a dwindling proportion of the total number of people who take gap years. If gap-year schemes increase, the actual number of people in that group may not fall, but their proportion of the total number taking gap years might fall because of the level of debt that students have at the end of their course. Proposals from all parties suggest similar levels of debt, and naturally people will want to clear it by earning money. Therefore, to an increasing extent, gap years will be taken between school and university or employment.

I want to touch on the issue of careers guidance. Taking a year out to reflect on whether one has made the right choice of studies gives one the opportunity to change that choice. However, I would hate us to recommend taking a gap year because those who are unable or do not want to take a year out have a higher drop-out rate, instead of offering proper careers guidance for higher education courses,. The hon. Member for Guildford will probably agree with me. Constituents tell me that changes in the careers service have meant that one group of students has made worse decisions than it might have, because the service has been focused on another group. The careers service is invaluable and should be invested in.

I would be interested to see the drop-out rates and course-change rates for those who have taken a gap year. However, it is obvious that reflecting for a year on whether one really wants to study a subject can give one pause. In my own case, I might have abandoned medicine if I had decided that I wanted to enter politics instead.

Mr. St. Aubyn: The hon. Gentleman makes a valid point about the careers service. He may not know—I only recently discovered it—that, under current funding arrangements, careers service advisers who persuade a school leaver to take a year out do not necessarily get a credit for that as an education outcome. Therefore, there is a disincentive for careers advisers to promote the idea of the year out for students, even when they think it might be appropriate. The Department should investigate that.

Dr. Harris: I know that the Minister heard that point and I shall leave her to respond to it. Perverse incentives come with all sorts of regulations and schemes to encourage people to do one thing or another, and they must be ironed out if they are a problem.

The third area I wanted to touch on was the attitude of universities and employers to the year out. I was pleased that vice-chancellors have changed their views on the gap year, because there is no reason why it should be frowned on, even it makes it difficult for universities to plan places, as they used to claim. It would not surprise me if a gap year was considered to be worth an extra grade at A-level, because of the advantages that it gives.

It is hard to say how one gained from one's own gap year, but I have watched people who have worked for me in the House of Commons—for remuneration in excess of the minimum wage—during a gap year, and they have blossomed. I currently have one such employee who is one of the best researchers that I have ever had, even though he is not yet a graduate. He has been superb; I have watched him develop in the role and he is now more than capable of bossing me around—which is perhaps the true test of competence for a research assistant.

It is important that universities recognise the importance of a year out. Maturity in general is an important factor in higher education: we know that mature students need fewer academic qualifications to succeed at university. A debate for another time and place is the plight of full-time mature students in higher education. The more mature the student, the better, for all the reasons that the hon. Member for Guildford gave. The Minister should send a message to the higher education sector that there should be no disincentive—in the form of fear that it will be badly regarded by universities—to students who wish to and are able to do so taking advantage of a year out.

There was an old-fashioned concern that students would forget everything that they had learned in the sixth form by the time they arrived at university a year later, but I remember that one forgets everything a week after taking exams for which one has swotted—that certainly happened in my case. I remembered what I had learned only six years later, working in a district general hospital, during bursts of feverish calculations on drug charts—which should be a worry to everyone.

My final point is tangential to the point made by the hon. Member for Guildford about the advantage of a gap year to post-qualification application to university—not to post-qualification entry, because we all expect qualifications to be a condition of entry to higher education. The gap year has all the advantages that the hon. Gentleman detailed, but it is not necessary to insist on or encourage a gap year to achieve such advantages. It would be a useful beginning if he and others could drop their seemingly instinctive opposition to the reform of A-levels, which they regard as the gold standard.

The higher education system in the United States has certain disadvantages and certain advantages, but it is a system that is envied. University applications are made on a much wider basis than final exams taken at the end of two years' study at A-level grade. Perhaps for that reason, the courses entered are more varied and enable people to choose which subjects to major in during their time at university. Many people perceive advantages in that, and hon. Members on both sides, including Liberal Democrat Members, should be encouraged to look beyond the A-level as the gold standard. That is tangential to the main thrust of what has been said about the advantages of a gap year, to which I wholly subscribe.

The hon. Gentleman should be applauded on his initiative in working with organisations at the front line, and emphasising the advantages of taking a gap year to those who would not otherwise consider it, or who might consider it another year's delay. Whether those opportunities are explored abroad or in this country is not as important as whether they are explored at all. The fact that the gap year is regarded as something that needs to done abroad can be a disincentive: certain groups of young people who are not fully engaged in taking advantage of gap-year opportunities might not want to go abroad, or might feel that it is beyond their means. Structured voluntary sector programmes in this country might open up possibilities for self-development to those who are not already taking advantage of such opportunities.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry): It is conventional to congratulate the hon. Member who secures an Adjournment debate. On this occasion, I want to go further by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) not only on initiating the debate and making an eloquent contribution, but on his personal, hands-on role in the Year Out Group, which will be launched after the conclusion of this debate. It is unusual, but welcome, for a Member of Parliament to be so directly involved in such a group.

The Chamber in Westminster Hall was devised to provide an opportunity for hon. Members to express consensus on matters that do not always enter into party political controversy. I hope that I do not spoil that consensus. It was not spoiled by my right hon. Friend the Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Brooke), or by the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris), and I suspect that it will not be spoiled by the Minister. I congratulate those hon. Members, in retrospect or in advance, on that consensus. We should welcome the fact that we can reach such consensus from time to time. It is remarkable that, by osmosis and a good deal of hard work, the Year Out Group already includes a strong collection of big hitters, and offers a huge range of opportunities to young people.

I begin by dealing with potentially contentious matters. The Minister would be surprised if those did not relate primarily to resources, although I strongly echo the comments that were made about the importance of adequate guidance for young people. To some extent, that guidance can be provided electronically through the new UCAS website, the Year Out Group and the higher education institutions. However, information is no substitute for guidance.

[Mr. Tim Boswell]

There is concern—to be debated in another context—about the new arrangements for the guidance of young people that are being introduced by the Government. They lay strong emphasis on dealing with the problems of the socially excluded. I have no problem with that emphasis, but it must not come at the expense of offering proper guidance to all young people. All young people have difficulties and opportunities, and need personal support in making choices.

The second issue is that of resources. I would be surprised and a touch shocked if the Minister got up and said that anyone who wants to take a year out will be fully funded to do so. That is not a realistic aspiration at this stage, but the Minister should bear in mind two matters. The first, to which reference has been made, is that when young people take a year out there is an opportunity cost to them, because they do not earn much during that period. Secondly, taking a gap year can add to the difficulties that may already be experienced as a result of recent changes to the higher education support system. Many young people will finish their higher education with a debt exceeding £10,000, so taking a non-earning year out before they reach the labour market, even if it has long-term benefits, must give them cause for thought. I hope that the Minister will take an holistic look at the overall impact on young people, as well as the impact on specific young people who lack the advantages that some of us have had. They, too, should have the right to share in such programmes if they would benefit hugely from doing so.

We must remember that all young people are individuals whose aspirations, confidence and wishes vary hugely. It would be wrong to send out a signal suggesting a conscription programme in which all young people are expected to participate. Each young person must decide whether and when to participate in a year-out programme and then choose the programme that is right for them. Some may seek activities for personal improvement at home or in their spare time, rather than take a formal year out. Both forms of experience can be valuable.

Guidance is important because young people will need to draw on the counsel and wisdom of parents, friends, teachers and, perhaps, the universities admitting them. I welcome the fact that universities now accept that prior experience is a positive benefit for young people. However, I would not wish them to make such experience a precondition of entry, nor do I anticipate their doing so. The decision should be for them, and the Minister and the Department would be ill advised to stir the system too strongly.

The Minister's encouragement and involvement is welcome. She should be able to offer advice on the guidelines, keep a close watch on what the Year Out Group is doing, and participate in appraisals and statistical activities with the various agencies and the group, but each young person should make a choice and we should keep our hands off. Any involvement by an institution should be solely a matter for the young person and the institution—Ministers should not directly interfere.

This is a general debate and it would not be helpful to give a personal curriculum vitae, but I shall draw on some of my experiences gained since my undergraduate years—I now realise that they were 40 years ago—and as an education Minister. Perhaps I should declare a non-interest in that I did not take a gap year, although I participated in a number of other extra-curricular activities before going to university. I seemed to learn quite a lot about civil defence, and when I got to university I found myself president of my junior common room. Those were the sort of activities that people did then and they were not irrelevant, even though they did not constitute a formal gap year.

Since that time, there has been a huge change in the character of higher education in this country. We have moved from what was—it was not intended to be—a largely elite system to a massified system. I do not mind that because it has been a positive development, encouraged by Conservative Governments. A third of our young people now go through higher education. However, that has inevitably affected the experience and nature of those participating.

One or two generations ago, many people went to higher education from well-known independent schools or leading grammar schools; now, there is much broader participation, and that is right and proper. The issue is not only that of resources and the economic background of students and potential students, but of students' confidence and social skills. The paradox is that, while many people would benefit hugely from the opportunities of a year out, their background and the resources immediately available to them make it less likely that they will apply or take part. They might even be discouraged, or feel themselves discouraged, from doing so.

That is a social problem that the Minister will not solve this morning, but I hope that the resources available to her and the powers of encouragement that she has are directed towards creating a better balance. Our common interest, which was well expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Guildford, is to ensure that, as people from all backgrounds move through higher education, they exploit all the opportunities available to them. They should not be excluded by an accident of education or geography.

My final comments relate to the education experience itself. There have been suggestions—which are, to some extent, concomitant on the expansion of the sector, the huge changes in the labour market, the development of globalisation and so forth—that higher education is simply a commercial development activity, as though one went through it as a staging post on the way to a lucrative career. That may be so—indeed, there is plenty of evidence that the ancient universities began primarily as vocational establishments, training people for service in public life in various capacities—but it is not the whole experience, nor should it become that. Universities have much more to offer an individual in terms of development than merely the ability to join the labour market at a higher rung than they would otherwise have done.

There is a good deal of evidence, much of which has been brought out in this debate, that the experience of a year out is very beneficial to the individual, partly because it is different from what he or she would have been doing at university: it is a different chunk of the map. It is often also beneficial to a student's future employer.

I did not take a formal year out myself, so I shall to draw on the experience of two young people whom I know well. Our children's contemporaries have been students in the past decade. I have seen the difference between the undergraduate who is reading for her first degree and the same person who is reading for her second first degree at another university, with a view to becoming a lawyer. The 21-year-old undergraduate was a very different person from the 18-year-old undergraduate. Another young person of my acquaintance, who went to university very early, had an interesting year out, which she divided between an advanced cookery course and working on the Archbishop of Canterbury's staff. As the late Eric Morecambe would have said, there is no answer to that. In diversifying their experience, those young people expressed the wisdom of centuries of educationists who have never seen the university or higher study as a degree factory, but regard it as a place for developing a rounded person.

In two respects, the year out is valuable. First, in many cases, it provides a physically demanding set of tests: it is the old idea, at which we should not scoff, of a healthy mind in a healthy body, although that is not possible for everyone. Secondly, it provides a moral challenge: many of my generation can still respond to Kennedy's inspiration for the Peace Corps and to the idea of asking not what your country can do for you

what you can do for your country—

or, indeed, for other countries. I hope that all parties share that healthy aspiration. It is a spark in young people that we must kindle, not extinguish. We welcome the initiative unreservedly.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Ms Margaret Hodge): It is a joy to participate in debates in Westminster Hall. They are informative and consensual, and I am sure that we all agree that they provide a better way in which to discuss issues that are important to our constituents.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) on securing this debate and on the work that he has done to support the organisations that will today launch the Year Out Group. I have known the hon. Gentleman for some time—he and I sat on the Education and Employment Select Committee. Although we did not agree on every issue, I recognise him to be a man of integrity who has done much practical work as a Back Bencher. In this instance, his efforts will ensure that a sector that is of increasing importance to young people will develop. Growing numbers of young people are taking a year out at some stage during their period of maturing. I join him and other hon. Members who have spoken in congratulating the 20 leading organisations that have come together. That effort, with support from the Universities and Colleges Admissions Service and other groups, have ensured that today's launch will go ahead.

I must declare an interest. I have four children, three of whom have taken a gap year. Quite horrifyingly, one of my children is currently wending her way across the world. She sends us e-mails about sharks in Thailand, which leave me shivering, and about sheep-farming in Australia. In her most amusing e-mail, sent from Vietnam, she asked, "Mum, What's wrong with communism? Is it that different from new Labour?" Her e-mails suggest that her experience is enhancing her capacities and abilities and preparing her for university when she returns.

The right hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Brooke) referred to his time in national service as his gap year. When he retires from the House, I am sure that he will have another gap year before he moves on to other activities. We all need the odd gap year in our lives to recoup, to recharge our batteries and to consider where to go next. Young people are no different in that respect. I did not have a gap year. I am afraid that my gap years involved the three years that I spent at university in the 1960s. I did not do a lot of work, although I underwent a great deal of personal development, and I still have nightmares about my lack of preparation for finals.

The hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris) talked about the gap year after university, which is becoming increasingly popular. People also often talk about career breaks. A member of staff in my private office is currently doing massive overtime to secure his second or third career break, during which he wants to travel round the world. Good luck to him, too.

The Government have made it clear that one of our objectives is to secure a real increase in the number of people of all ages who become involved in voluntary activities. Many activities during the gap year involve volunteering. It is difficult to attract young people to voluntary activities, because they tend to think that such work involves people such as myself–middle-aged, middle-class women. Our challenge is to turn that perception around, build on young people's interests and ensure that when they put something into a community, they get something back. To the extent that the gap year complements our efforts in the voluntary sector, it is of great importance.

For many young people, the transition from school to college or university, or from university to work, is an especially important time in their life. The experience that they gain during that period can be formative to their career choices or their development later in life. It is a time in which young people are particularly open to new experiences and are looking to be challenged. What young people choose to do at those stages in their lives vary from individual to individual. For some, the gap year or the year out will work to their benefit and be life-altering. Every year, thousands of young people decide to take a year out after finishing their full-time education—whether post-school or post-university—before entering the labour market. They are able to choose to take part in an enormously varied range of activities during that period.

People tend to think of the gap year as being spent abroad. That is true in some cases, but not all. Some people choose to get work experience, take part in exchanges or join educational programmes that offer alternatives to more formal academic teaching. Voluntary work in this country is as important as voluntary work abroad. It may involve anything from improving the environment to working with homeless people, to bringing arts and music into communities—in fact, any activity that one can think of. It is an endless list, and the benefits are enormous and valued.

The Government believe that young people should be able to take up the year-out opportunities that are right for them. Hon. Members have raised the question of Government financial support, and it may be helpful if I respond to that. We give support directly from the overseas training programme, which exists to give host projects help in undertaking specific pieces of work in developing countries. It aims to provide young people, many of whom may be interested in continuing to work in development, with a worthwhile experience. It also aims to promote international understanding. The programme is funded by the Overseas Development Administration and managed by VSO, so it receives money directly. Placements are currently limited, but a start has been made. Having known a couple of people who have been involved in the programme, I know that it is successful.

A range of opportunities are funded through Europe. The Erasmus programme promotes student mobility and offers the opportunity to study and learn other languages. About 10,000 UK students took part in it last year. The European Union also offers the Leonardo da Vinci programme, which provides vocational training. The youth exchange centre administers the British Council youth millennium awards scheme, which enables 18 to 25-year-olds to spend time abroad developing skills that will benefit their local communities. The European voluntary service enables young people in EU member states to spend up to a year doing voluntary work. My nephew took part in that, and gained worthwhile experience in France. The "Youth for Europe" programme arranges international exchanges, seminars, project training and other activities. I hope that that quick run through the range of initiatives by which the Government directly fund programmes shows the range of opportunities that are available to young people to broaden their horizons.

We should remember that the year out may not be right for everyone, and some young people will not want to take it up. While respecting everyone's individual decisions, we must ensure that they make informed choices. That is why we are supporting the Year Out Group. The group's guidelines are very useful to young people and their advisers. They encourage young people to ask the right questions and open up opportunities that they would not have thought about before taking their year out.

Several hon. Members referred to the function of the careers service in providing advice and opportunities in relation to the gap year. We are in the process of establishing the new Connexions service, and I shall pass on the idea of advice on gap-year opportunities to my colleagues in the Department with responsibility for that. We will consider whether it can be covered in the prospectus on which the Department will soon be consulting.

Hon. Members have alluded to many of the benefits that result from a year out. The main benefits are gained by young people themselves. They learn vital skills that cannot be gained from academic involvement, known in today's terminology as soft skills, including working with other people and problem solving. They also gain self-confidence, which is important in later life. Those young people also learn about other people and about other environments with which they might otherwise never have contact. They gain impressions and experiences that will stay with them for the rest of their lives. Those experiences can help to motivate people who might have been disaffected in school, to change their perspectives, raise their aspirations and provide them with the knowledge that they have made a difference to other people and communities.

Other beneficiaries include the organisations with which young people spend their gap year, which are often helped to deliver work more effectively; and employers, who are able to recruit from a pool of young people with a wider set of talents. Moreover, educational institutions, including universities, are increasingly asking young people what they have achieved in addition to their academic qualifications. I endorse the comments made about the importance of the work done by UCAS to enable young people to apply for university in a more streamlined way. The personal statements, with which many of us have struggled to help our children, form part of those applications. As academic standards rise, the importance of that personal statement grows. If a young person can say that he or she plans to take a year out, and that that experience will be structured and relevant to his or her course, I would expect universities to see that as a way of differentiating between candidates. The personal growth that young people who have made good use of a gap year will have experienced when they start their studies will give them a head start over their peers.

I agree with all hon. Members, especially the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon, who said that the year out should be available to a broad range of people. There is a problem of equity, but it does not arise solely from money and resources; it is also connected with access to information and opportunity. That is why the initiative that we are launching today is so important. It is also about the much tougher agenda that the Government are attempting to address relating to access to higher education and ensuring greater equality through a range of initiatives.

The year out can also change young people's views on their contribution to communities. Learning the importance of community and enhancing the opportunities for individuals within the community are vital threads in the Government's agenda. We want young people to learn those lessons at an early stage. Equality and opportunity for the many are best enhanced through strong communities.

I notice that time is hurrying on, Mr. Deputy Speaker, so I shall conclude by saying that we have heard today about the setting up of the Year Out Group—an organisation that draws together several organisations involved in year-out activities. I endorse the work carried out by the hon. Member for Guildford; we believe the group to be a welcome development. Voluntary work can, and should, be challenging for the individual concerned. That is part of its reward. Working overseas has its own challenges and difficulties, and the group is confronting those issues

Speakers have mentioned many organisations involved in supporting young people who decide to take a year out. Some have charitable status; others are companies; they all offer young people the opportunity, here and abroad, to become involved in worthwhile activities. I am pleased to endorse the guidelines prepared by the Year Out Group, and I congratulate it on the website that it launched this morning. Both will ensure that young people are helped to make more informed choices about their lives, and to do so with greater confidence in the quality of the opportunities that they pursue.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Guildford on securing this debate, and I look forward to joining him at the launch of the Year Out Group. In the spirit of cross-party co-operation, I am happy to offer him a lift in the Government car, so that we get there on time.

Northern Ireland Fire Brigade

12.30 pm

Mr. Ken Maginnis (Fermanagh and South Tyrone): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak briefly on the plight—if that is not an exaggeration—of fire officers in Northern Ireland and some of the problems that they face, and have faced consistently, during the past 15 years. I acknowledge at an early stage that, subsequent to questions tabled by me, which were answered on 11 April, the Minister has taken steps to remedy certain problems. One of those problems would have led to the first strike by the fire service in Northern Ireland since 1977. I am grateful to the Minister, as are members of the Fire Brigades Union and the public at large, for quickly recognising the difficulties and taking steps to avert what would have been a serious problem.

I hope that the Minister will not think that I am nit-picking, but I want to draw attention to one or two points that relate to his answers to my questions. I know that Ministers approve answers, rather than prepare them, but he suggested in one answer that civil disturbance call-outs often involved children who threw stones at appliances. I hope that he will recognise that that is a derogatory way in which to regard some of the hazards that fire officers have faced down the years. Last weekend, we witnessed the sad effects of throwing stones during a football match. Similarly, as the Minister will acknowledge, in the past 30 years, firemen in Northern Ireland have been seriously injured, or have given their lives.

In another answer, the Minister said that firemen in Northern Ireland have four additional days leave a year, but on closer examination, he will realise that different fire authorities have different terms and conditions. Compared to firemen in certain regional fire authorities, those in Northern Ireland may indeed have an extra four days leave, but compared to the firemen in Northamptonshire, there is just one day's difference. Such issues must be carefully understood, so that we do not give the impression that there is a huge difference between firemen in Northern Ireland and those in other regions of the United Kingdom.

I shall deal in due course with some significant factors that affect the fire brigade in Northern Ireland, but at this stage, the Minister will acknowledge that the attempt to introduce a two-tier system in the Northern Ireland fire brigade has proved a folly. Since the most recent agreement in Northern Ireland, I have been bombarded with equality agendas. Everyone must now produce an equality agenda. I am waiting for my elderly next-door neighbour to produce an equality agenda for when he goes down the road to the pub for his pint. We are overwhelmed with equality agendas. Yet our newest young recruits were to be paid, as whole-time firemen, £24.99 a week less and, as retained firefighters, £1.24 per call-out less than their established colleagues, which is not acceptable.

One acknowledges the dangers of being a firefighter in Northern Ireland, and across the United Kingdom, but what do those dangers have to do with the extent to which firefighters are brought on the scene when there are civil disturbances? Sadly, although we hope, on a daily, weekly and monthly basis, to see a change in the situation, in 1998 there were 1,156 civil disturbance call-outs in Northern Ireland—these are the Minister's own figures—and in 1999 there were 555. That may seem like a halving of the problem, but if we take out the figures for one month—July—which two years ago was quite fraught, to put it mildly, and compare the remaining 11 months, in 1998 there were 413 other call-outs and the following year there were 476. That is considerably more than one a day.

Until the Minister took a hand subsequent to my written questions, there was folly in the way in which an agreement negotiated and put in place under the aegis of the Labour Relations Agency was to be swept aside. If one wonders why that was so, one has only to look at the fire authority's annual report for 1998-99. On page 25 it alludes to its financial difficulties and says:

> A significant control mechanism for containing costs was allowing employee numbers to fall.

It went on to detail the extent to which the numbers fell. The Northern Ireland fire authority's report shows that its fire service was being called in demonstrably more difficult circumstances than other fire brigades, with—again I emphasise this—traditionally fewer resources.

Following a review of fire cover in Northern Ireland some years ago a major report was published that took, as the costs, the figures for 1983-84. That may seem a long time ago, but at that time the per capita costs of the fire service made startling reading. I shall not compare them with the £17.40 per capita that the London fire brigade cost in that year. It is more realistic to compare Northern Ireland, with its large rural areas, to Scotland.

The Scottish brigade cost £13.55 per capita. The Northern Ireland fire service cost £9.74. That is a considerable difference, with about 28 per cent. less being invested in what I consider to be a comparable fire service. More up-to-date figures are difficult to come by, but the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy produced figures for 1996-97, when the comparative figures were £24.83 per head of the population for Northern Ireland against £30.38 for Scotland. The estimate for 1998-99 showed Northern Ireland at £25.80 and Scotland at £33.45. I simply ask the Minister what the cumulative effect of the underfunding from 1983-84 to the present must be.

Mr. Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire): Will the hon. Gentleman clarify whether, in his judgment, the saving is mainly the result of reduced staffing or reduced equipment and resources in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Maginnis: If the hon. Gentleman will bear with me, I shall try to cover that later.

I know that statistics are boring, but we are talking about financial issues so statistics are important. The cost of responding to emergency calls across the regions varies considerably. In metropolitan fire and civil defence authorities, it is about £1,102 per call, whereas in Scotland it is as high as £1,377. Northern Ireland is the second lowest at £1,163. There is a fair difference between those figures.

Does the Minister accept that a major problem has to be tackled? The reality is that the cumulative effect is reflected in several ways, which brings us back to the question asked by the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Öpik). It is reflected in the cutting back of the establishment, which was identified in various reports including the 1998-99 annual report. We are talking about undermanning. There has also been a reduction in the updating and modernising of equipment and stations. I shall return to the subject of stations.

The cutback could inevitably be dangerous. I hope that I suggested that 77 per cent. of the budget pays for staffing. If there were a shortfall, it would be reflected in the quality of training and retraining. Nothing stands still in firefighting. There are changes and advances in technique and equipment to which I feel that the fire service in Northern Ireland is entitled, in the same way as any other fire service in the United Kingdom. I cannot quantify the extent to which training suffers, but I shall try to give an example of the undermanning and extrapolate that argument to other subjects. To do so is not unreasonable.

Page 25 of the fire authority's annual report refers to an approved establishment of 1,919 whole-time firemen and 980 retained firefighters. Yet the reality is that the number of full-time firemen has fallen from 895 to 872 and retained firefighters from 923 to 827. Administrative and manual personnel also decreased: from an establishment of 205 there was a fall from 196 to 191. If my mathematics is right, the figures show that a total establishment of 2,104 was reduced to 1,890. In other words, we are manning at a level 10 per cent. below what is required, in a context in which there were 16 deaths from fire in Northern Ireland in 1998 and 28 in 1999.

Let me return to the 827 retained firefighters. For presentational purposes, they are presumed to be available as 24-hour manpower units. In reality, 75 or 80 per cent. of them provide only limited availability—12-hour cover, perhaps—and two limited-availability retained firemen equal only one of what is intended. What we therefore require is not a reduction from 980 to 827, but more than 1,700 retained firefighters. I am quoting the fire authority's own figures. I may be boring people with these statistics, but I do not how to illustrate the point without referring to them.

I shall compare Essex fire brigade with that of Northern Ireland. Essex covers a population comparable—in fact, just a little less—to Northern Ireland's, though its geographical region is only a quarter of its size. In 1998, the Essex brigade reacted to just under 23,000 call-outs, compared with Northern Ireland's 32,000. Yet the manpower and budget for Essex is greater than for Northern Ireland.

I shall briefly move on to fire stations. In the Northern Ireland fire brigade's survey of 1984, a requirement for new retained part-time fire stations was listed. Sixteen years later, Aughnacloy in my constituency and Market Hill are still without fire stations. Similarly, there was to be an upgrading to provide greater full-time cover in places such as Coleraine, Newtownards, Portadown, Enniskillen and Omagh. Again, that has not happened and one wonders why. In fact, I know why—it is all to do with underfunding.

Some of those towns are well known for the wrong reasons. We all remember the tragedy in Enniskillen and the tragedy in Omagh. We are all aware of the tragic confrontation over the years in Portadown. Yet these major rural towns remain without adequate fire cover.

In considering those points, I ask the Minister to remember that Northern Ireland does not have the advantage of inter-regional back-up. If Essex is under pressure, a nearby region can provide support. There is no similar arrangement in Northern Ireland, and because of our political circumstances, we do not even receive much support from the Irish Republic. Our fire brigades will go across into Donegal, but because of the confrontational nature of society in Northern Ireland, that support is not reciprocated to any degree.

I understand that 15 stations are inadequately manned and require semi-permanent back-up arrangements that are placing neighbouring stations under huge strain. There is the danger that we will have inadequate cover for a tragedy. Why does the Northern Ireland fire authority not advertise in the local press to counter the undermanning? That would make an impact, and seems a simple way forward, yet it is not pursued. I wonder whether the fire authority is being kept fully acquainted with the facts. I believe that the authority is being kept in the dark in some respects.

As I said, I know that the Minister endeavours to provide meaningful responses when a serious issue is raised with him. We have averted the crisis and the firemen are comparatively happy. Can he move the situation forward on a broader basis? Given all Northern Ireland's problems, and its isolation from support, can he ensure that the fire service receives equipment and finance that are comparable with those in other regions of the United Kingdom? Despite the dedication of the fire officers, the people of Northern Ireland should not be required to accept second-rate fire and emergency protection.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. George Howarth): I congratulate the hon. Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone (Mr. Maginnis) on his choice of subject, and I thank him for his generous remarks about me. The Government appreciate the work that the Northern Ireland fire brigade has carried out during many long years of civil unrest. It has consistently provided a high quality of professional firefighting, without showing favour towards any part of the community, and I know that almost everybody in Northern Ireland agrees with that. The brigade is owed an enormous debt of gratitude, and I am happy to place on record my admiration and respect for its work and for the dedication and courage with which it carries out its work.

The hon. Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone raised a couple of issues that arose from written answers that I gave him recently. We did not intend to cause offence by highlighting the stone-throwing incident, we merely wanted to point out that some incidents of disorder have no sectarian dimension. They are regrettable and should not be excused, indeed, they should be condemned, but they should not be seen as unique to Northern Ireland. Sadly, and unacceptably, such incidents are not unknown in all parts of the United Kingdom, including in my own constituency of Knowsley, North and Sefton, East. However, that does not undermine the fact that firefighters in Northern Ireland have had to carry out their job in difficult circumstances and, in many cases, in circumstances specific to Northern Ireland.

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned the written answer that I gave him, in which Hansard records that I said that there is > a Northern Ireland allowance of four days additional leave.—[Official Report, 11 April 2000; Vol. 348, c. 126W.]

Hansard has accepted responsibility for the error, and has undertaken to correct the record accordingly. The correct answer, and the one that I submitted, was that Northern Ireland firefighters receive a Northern Ireland allowance and—the crucial word being "and"—four additional days' leave in comparison with firefighters in Great Britain. I did not want to cause offence or mislead the hon. Gentleman. It was simply an error in how Hansard presented the information. The Fire Brigades Union called for me to resign over the issue, but, fortunately, I could establish that Hansard had made the mistake rather than me, in time for me to retrieve my resignation letter from the Secretary of State's in-tray.

Mr. Maginnis: I shall certainly not endorse the call for the Minister to resign, but I quibble over even his amended answer. To pick out the phrase "four days" and suggest that Northern Ireland firefighters have four days more than all other fire brigades is not accurate either. In the case of Northampton, the difference is one day. We are dealing with packages, and we must not pick part of a package and suggest that the brigade is more favourably treated than other brigades.

Mr. Howarth: As the brigade receives those four days, it is treated more favourably than some other brigades. However, I accept that it is not unique, and that different local arrangements are involved.

I shall make three brief points before I conclude, as time is short. First, like the hon. Gentleman, I am pleased that the dispute that was looming has been resolved through sensible negotiation between the fire authority and the trade union involved, the Fire Brigades Union. A sensible conclusion was reached, and I am glad that I played a small part in encouraging them to negotiate a sensible solution to the problem. In such circumstances, the use of industrial action, which was threatened, is unsuitable, as I told the Fire Brigades Union, among others.

The hon. Gentleman raised two issues with which I shall deal briefly. The first related to the finances of the fire brigade and the authority, and the second related to manning levels. The fire authority's baseline budget allocation has risen from £43.7 million for 1998-99 to £51.4 million for the current year. In 1999, an upgraded control room was opened and training facilities at

[Mr. George Howarth]

Boucher crescent were improved. The modernisation and improvement of fire services throughout Northern Ireland has been pursued through the development of efficient maintenance of the fire brigade fleet and firefighting equipment, of which there have been several examples.

The authority's budget has increased by £2.9 million for the 1999-2000 allocation. An additional £4.9 million was allocated last year, which is an increase of 8.5 per cent. in real terms. There has also been benefits from the comprehensive spending review.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. McWilliam): Order. Time is up.

Landfill Tax

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test): I am delighted to have an opportunity to talk about the operation of the landfill levy. Until recently, that has received an almost universally positive reception, probably because people observe the two ends of the tax: first, as a tax on putting waste material into the ground instead of doing more imaginative things with it, such as recycling it or reusing it, and, secondly, the magical appearance of large sums of money for environmental schemes and good causes apparently as a result of the levying of the tax.

There can be no doubt that both observations are well grounded. The tax, which is the United Kingdom's first green tax, is in principle a sound application of the idea that one should tax "bads" rather than "goods". The indiscriminate dumping of our society's waste in landfill sites is clearly a considerable environmental bad that could be ameliorated by diverting substantial elements of the waste. A tax escalator that encourages such a change in behaviour is clearly a good idea. There is also no doubt that many local voluntary groups, church halls and environmental organisations have benefited from the £90 million that has so far been allocated from the proceeds of the tax. However, the bit in between the raising of the tax and the distribution of its elements is a problem and has rightly been the subject of a recent inquiry by the Select Committee on the Environment, Transport and Regional Affairs, and of a sustained inquiry by The Guardian.

The latter inquiry examined several aspects of the process and drew some frankly unfavourable conclusions, which will become part of the evidence in a further inquiry by the Environment, Transport and Regional Affairs Committee into the effect of the landfill tax later this year. I do not wish to trespass on that inquiry nor to cover all the issues raised by The Guardian inquiry, which covered a range of topics, including the illegal dumping of contaminated soil, the commonality of interest of environmental bodies handing out the money, the evasion of the tax itself, inspection of sites by the Environment Agency and several other issues. Rather, I want to concentrate my thoughts on an issue on which neither the Select Committee nor The Guardian inquiries focused .

Why is the operation of the tax beginning to go wrong? Is it because a few bad apples are taking advantage of a few holes in the legislation or is it something more serious, or are problems arising because of the design of the mechanism that takes us from the tax to the handouts? I believe that it is the latter. There are, and will be, attempted evasions, fly tipping and the illegal passing off of active waste as inert material. Indeed, The Guardian inquiry chronicled several such scams. They are almost an inevitable by-product of an increasing tax and demonstrate that the tax is beginning to work in that people think that it is worth their time and trouble trying to evade it. That is an important issue, but it is no different from the consequences of any other tax. The solution to the problem is to ensure that resources are available to secure proper enforcement of the regulations.

It is painfully clear that the Environment Agency does not have sufficient ability to investigate and enforce, and that the courts still fail to take environmental crimes as seriously as they should. They are matters of process. Almost as a throwaway remark, we can say that, as a consequence of the landfill levy escalator, there will be a direct correlation between the level of tax and the level of attempted evasion, and that a proportion of the additional levy should be allocated to ensure that enforcement increases at the same rate as the tax.

It is the mechanism for distributing the tax or a portion of it that is seriously at fault. That will not be cured by better enforcement or by review of its working, as its basic logic is flawed. Unless we appreciate that, matters will get worse not better. That would be a great tragedy, because the input and output principles of the tax are sound.

Let us consider the logic of the mechanism. The tax is collected, but as it is a green tax it serves two purposes. The money does not simply go to the Exchequer, but is designed to assist a change in behaviour. On that principle, 20 per cent. of the tax take is to be recycled for environmental purposes. One might assume that that is for the purposes of the tax as stated at the time of its introduction, which were, according to a memorandum from Her Majesty's Customs and Excise submitted to the Environment Sub-Committee's inquiry, > to promote the "polluter pays" principle, by increasing the price of landfill to better reflect its environmental costs

> to promote a more sustainable approach to waste management in which less is produced and more is recovered.

So, where does the 20 per cent. of the tax go? The Treasury designates it as tax forgone, which means that it is regarded as having never been collected. I imagine that that is to do with Treasury rules, hypothecation and so on, but the result is that the tax, which is clearly a real tax and public money, stays in the hands of the companies that pay it. Those are the companies that collect waste and place it in landfill sites. One might imagine that they pass the costs on to the people from whom they collect, which escalates the costs and the concern about tipping in landfill sites.

Instead of paying the 20 per cent. to the Exchequer, the companies pay it as a tax forgone to the environmental bodies credit scheme, which comprises several organisations set up specifically to receive the money and disburse it to good causes. Those causes are specified under the scheme in six headings, which, roughly, are land reclamation, reduction of the effects of pollution on such land, research and development into sustainable waste management, the provision or maintenance of a park or similar amenity if it is in the vicinity of a landfill site, the restoration of a building for religious worship if it has an environmental connotation, and administrative services to other environmental bodies. Strikingly absent from that list is any provision for money for recycling, an omission that has been rectified only now, four years after the commencement of the scheme.

We may ask ourselves who carries out the overwhelming amount of recycling, and the answer would be the local authorities. They also have to pay to put their waste into landfill sites, and the more that the tax goes up, the more that they will pay. They will pay from the same legislatively limited revenue funding as they might otherwise use for the promotion and extension of recycling, which is one of the aims of the landfill levy in the first place. We have established that they cannot recover money for recycling from the environmental bodies credit scheme, because that was not included in the six headings and has been added only recently.

We might think that matters would be different now that the rules have been changed to include recycling, but that is not so. The rules state that only registered environmental bodies can receive money from the 20 per cent. of the tax under the terms of the environmental bodies credit scheme. To date, 1,200 such bodies have been registered with ENTRUST, a private company limited by guarantee, which regulates the scheme. However, if they are to register, the bodies have to be certified as not being controlled directly or indirectly by a local authority or a landfill operator.

Local authorities are therefore organised out of getting their hands on any proceeds of the tax. The most that they can do is attempt to press the case or otherwise support one of the registered environmental bodies to obtain money locally that might support the environmental objectives that they find increasingly difficult to sustain by themselves. Hampshire county council and the city councils of Portsmouth and Southampton made a joint submission to the Environment Sub-Committee inquiry in which they estimated that 20 per cent. of their waste management budgets went simply on landfill tax.

The same restriction does not apply to the landfill operators. They have set up, as a vehicle for the distribution of the tax forgone, a number of environmental trusts, supposedly at arm's length from the landfill companies, which are empowered to make the decisions on how to distribute the money. Furthermore, landfill companies can claim a tax credit of up to 90 per cent. of their contributions, so only 10 per cent. of the money that goes into the environmental trusts is real money donated by the landfill company.

A bizarre twist then arises. ENTRUST authorised landfill companies to raise the other 10 per cent by soliciting so-called third party contributions—another organisation would pay the money on behalf of the landfill companies, but, curiously, the landfill company can continue to claim tax relief on the money as if it had paid it. So the landfill company may appear to have donated, for example, £100,000 to an environmental trust, but in reality it gains around £3,000 net from the process.

Notwithstanding that, the landfill companies exercise substantial control over the environmental trusts into which taxpayers' money goes. Thus, Cory Waste Ltd. has an associated environmental trust, Cory Environmental Ltd., the Onyx Environmental Group has the Onyx Environmental Trust and so on. It is, therefore, not surprising that the pattern of allocation of funds between the various headings shows that 55 per cent. of all funds go to just one category—category D—covering the provision or maintenance of amenities in the vicinity of landfill tips. It is as if the board giving out lottery grants consisted of the shops selling the lottery tickets, convened area by area, and empowered to provide community centres down the road with the name of the relevant sweetshop on them.

I am not blaming the landfill companies. They are rational businesses and will do what is best for their businesses. They have found that they can appear to be positive stewards of the environment and can secure greater acceptance of their landfill sites in particular locations by showering the vicinity with environmental goodies, using our money to do so, and all quite legally. I do not blame the landfill companies for seeking to offset their 10 per cent. contributions when many hungry organisations can see the sense of seeding the pot with a relatively small sum to secure a far greater amount in grant for a cause that they favour. That motivation is especially strong for companies that were excluded from the carve up because of the way in which the scheme was set up. It is no surprise that many local authorities have contributed the additional 10 per cent. on the understanding that a project that they favour will receive funds from the environmental trust.

I cannot blame local authorities for doing that because it is a rational response to the irrational set of circumstances in which they find themselves. What is peculiar is that there is no published register of third-party contributions, so the public cannot see who has put in the additional 10 per cent. and to what extent it correlates with the award of grants. What is even more peculiar is that, until last autumn, even ENTRUST did not know the identities of those contributors. That has changed to a limited extent in response to a recommendation of the Select Committee on the Environment, Transport and Regional Affairs that a register be made public. The Government stated that changes in the 1999 Budget rules would introduce a > new requirement that ENTRUST be notified of the identity of third parties. This will enable ENTRUST to be satisfied that no benefit arises from the contribution. The Government sees no need to go further by requiring that a public register be kept.

That is the final piece of strangeness. Why do people give unsolicited contributions of 10 per cent. of the cost of the liability of the landfill company if it is not to secure some benefit? Is there any reason, other than occasional and breathtaking philanthropy, for apparently anonymous donations to be used by landfill companies as if the money had originated with them?

All in all, it does not surprise me that there are occasional excesses and self-serving use of the money, as shown by the example unearthed by The Guardian of a supposed experimental environmental road which—well, I never—led to a landfill site and was used only by lorries going to and from that site. I am surprised that things are not much worse. It is perhaps to the credit of the bodies regulating the scheme, and of the landfill companies on the whole, that a scheme that almost seems set up to be abused in most cases has not been. The loser in all this is the prime objective of the tax—to promote a more sustainable approach to waste management, in which less waste is produced and more is recovered or recycled.

Dozens of churches have been restored, hundreds of parks laid out and scores of contaminated sites remediated and landscaped. That is all very good, but are they squarely in the front line of the stated objective of the tax? At some stage, logically, we will run out of churches, parks and ancient household waste tips in the vicinity of landfill sites. What will we do with the money then?

It is high time for a fundamental review of the way in which the scheme is constructed. It is not that it has not done good: it has. It is not that it is hopelessly corrupt: it is not. It is simply that it is badly set up and its results are far from being what they could be if it were differently conceived.

We should start with some simple building blocks. I have three suggestions. First, the money should be handed over as a tax obligation to an independent organisation for consideration and distribution; secondly, the key terms of reference of this organisation should be the original aims of the tax; thirdly, a portion of the money made available should be set aside for a local authority challenge fund to assist with investment in recycling and reuse at local level, which is vital if waste is to be diverted before it enters the stream that leads to landfill. Those three simple rules could transform the way in which we administer and distribute the income from this most worthwhile of taxes.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Timms): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead) on securing this debate. I know that it is a subject that he has followed with great interest over a long period.

I agree with him that the landfill tax is a worthwhile tax. The Government are committed to reducing the environmental consequences on land of the way in which we dispose of waste. I very much welcome this opportunity to discuss the role that the tax plays in helping us to achieve that aim.

The tax was introduced on 1 October 1996 and, as my hon. Friend said, had predominantly environmental objectives. I agree that it has done much good. It forms a key element of the Government's waste strategy, with its aims of recovering the environmental costs of landfilling and encouraging waste producers to consider more environmentally friendly alternatives to landfill such as waste minimisation, reuse and recycling. There are two rates of tax—a lower rate of £2 a tonne on inert waste, such as soil and stone, and a standard rate of £11 a tonne on active waste, including household waste, which has a greater potential to pollute the environment.

The tax is already having a marked impact on waste management practices, but we want it to have a greater effect. Therefore, in the 1999 Budget the Chancellor announced that the standard rate would be increased by £1 a tonne each year, with a review in 2004. The first of those increases has just taken place. This escalator will encourage greater diversion from landfill and will allow waste producers and managers to plan future waste management effectively. It also represents a prudent approach, because it allows us to measure the effects of the increases in tax and the tax's performance before we decide on a longer-term strategy for the rates that should be applied to the tax.

We need to keep an eye on the way things are going, to make sure that the landfill tax is achieving its objectives. That is why we carried out a major review of it, which was reported at the March 1998 Budget.

My hon. Friend referred to recent allegations of fraudulent abuse of the landfill tax and the environmental bodies credit scheme. We take any allegations of abuse extremely seriously. For example, Customs and Excise and ENTRUST uncovered last year, in the course of ENTRUST's enforcement work, serious allegations of misuse of scheme funds, which are under investigation by the Serious Fraud Office, and Hertfordshire police have made seven arrests. Customs and officials at the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions have now also received the 85-page dossier prepared by The Guardian following its investigations. Those allegations are being examined carefully, but I cannot respond to the conclusions and recommendations until the examination is complete. However, I want to comment in general on some of the issues raised by the dossier and by my hon. Friend.

On the environmental bodies credit scheme, which was introduced at the same time as the tax, landfill site operators who contribute to approved environmental bodies can, as my hon. Friend said, reclaim 90 per cent. of their contribution as a tax credit, up to a ceiling of 20 per cent. of their landfill tax liability. A contribution can also be generated by third-party contributors who fund favoured environmental projects through an operator. The scheme supports projects that improve local communities around landfill sites, reclaim brownfield land, or support research into, and education about, more sustainable waste management.

Since its inception, the scheme has raised about £250 million, which has been handed over to the environmental bodies. As my hon. Friend said, about £90 million of that sum has so far been spent, and we need to ensure that the apparent lag does not continue for too long. The amount that is handed over and the amount that is spent must match reasonably closely. At the moment, the scheme costs the Treasury about £80 million a year in forgone revenue, and is regulated by ENTRUST, to which my hon. Friend referred.

A number of changes were made to the scheme from 1 January. As my hon. Friend noted, recycling was explicitly added to those research projects that can attract funding, thereby creating a new category that covers market development for recycled products. The Government want to encourage greater spending in those areas. How and when operators can claim credits was simplified, and the scheme's rules were changed to make it clear that third-party contributors cannot benefit from projects that they fund.

A main aim of the tax credit scheme is to involve the private sector in supporting environmental projects, so it is not surprising that industry should be involved in how the money is spent. However, a contributor is not allowed to gain a direct benefit from a donation. A contributing operator or other third party who wants to finance an environmental project may benefit only in a general sense—for example, through improved standing in the local community or publicly available research.

To help prevent "direct benefit", operators cannot control those environmental bodies that receive their contributions. However, there is nothing to prevent operators from influencing bodies to which they donate. Indeed, in respect of large donations, Customs and Excise recommends that operators have such an influence, or that they at least take a close interest in the project, so that they can ensure that the money is properly spent. Customs and Excise has told me that it will seek repayment of tax credits from any operator who fails to take such precautions, and whose contributions are subsequently mis-spent.

Of course, all manner of influences may help to determine where and how contributions are eventually spent. Foremost is the landfill site operator, but other influences include local communities around landfill sites, third-party contributors, customers of operators—including local authorities—and specialist advisers such as non-governmental organisations. We see nothing wrong in that, so long as contributions are spent on approved objects and contributing people or organisations do not benefit directly.

As regulator of the environmental bodies credit scheme, it is the job of ENTRUST to ensure that the money is properly spent by environmental bodies, and that no direct benefit passes to contributors. Customs and Excise, which audits ENTRUST's performance to ensure that it meets an acceptable standard, is satisfied that ENTRUST now has appropriate systems in place to identify abuses and revoke non-compliant bodies. Those are the mechanisms and systems that led to the arrests to which I referred. ENTRUST has carried out about 500 assurance visits since the scheme's inception. ENTRUST cannot guarantee that no fraud or abuse is taking place within the scheme, but Customs and Excise has assured me that ENTRUST is fully investigating the new allegations and will report to it on its findings. The Government will carefully consider any concerns that arise from that report. I note my hon. Friend's point about public access to the register of third-party bodies.

My hon. Friend would like more funding for local authorities to help with investment in plant and equipment to recycle more household waste and divert more waste from landfill. The case for such additional expenditure will of course be considered as part of this year's spending review, because recycling and support for recycling is a call on mainstream Government spending. Recycling schemes have to be considered in the round, alongside other priorities such as health and education.

I point out to my hon. Friend that if the cash that can currently be credited to those who pay landfill tax were to become instead a fund directed by the Government, it would count as public spending, whereas the existing scheme does not. That spending would need to be contained within the envelope of total public spending, which has already been announced for the next three years. My hon. Friend's proposal would therefore lead to reduced spending on recycling, which is contrary to his intentions. However, if the organisation were to be independent of the Government, and managed a portfolio of projects, and landfill tax payers chose where their credits were directed within that portfolio, it might not count as public spending. That is an interesting idea that I should like to consider further, and I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising it. However, I caution him that if, as he suggested, some of that money was then handed to local authorities, it would certainly count as public spending. That reinforces my point that the real decisions concerning public support for recycling must be taken in the context of the spending review.

I have not yet worked out how it is possible for a company to donate £100,000 to an environmental body and find itself £3,000 better off at the end of the transaction, as my hon. Friend suggested. If he has any examples, I would be keen to see them.

[Mr. Stephen Timms]

The Government would like more environmental bodies to support more local authority recycling projects. We are considering ways of improving the performance of the scheme by encouraging contributors to target their funding at more strategic projects. We have expressed the view that more of the available money should go into sustainable waste management, such as waste minimisation, reuse, recycling and the development of markets for recycled products. Officials are working with the waste management industry, ENTRUST and environmental bodies to develop guidelines to achieve that.

I turn to activities that are exempt from waste management licensing. Landfill tax applies only to waste disposal landfill sites that are licensed under environmental law because that activity has the environmental cost that the tax was designed to recover. Some activities involving the recovery of inert waste are exempt from waste management licensing, provided that they comply with the terms of the exemption and do not endanger health or the environment. The recovery of waste under those exemptions from licensing can include the construction of roadways, buildings and recreational facilities such as golf courses.

The "Dispatches" television programme on 6 April blamed the alleged abuses of the exempt activities regime and illegal fly tipping on the desire to avoid paying landfill tax. However, in one of the cases shown, in which the waste came from a contaminated brownfield site, the disposal would probably have qualified for exemption from landfill tax under the contaminated land exemption if it had been taken to a licensed site. In another case, the waste, if taxed, would have attracted only the lower rate of £2 per tonne.

The Government, recognising that the tax was leading to a serious shortfall in suitable inert waste for restoring landfill sites and filling quarries, introduced an exemption from tax for waste used for such purposes from 1 October last year. It is therefore difficult to see how the tax promotes the illegal dumping of inert waste.

Dr. Whitehead: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Timms: I do not think that I can, given the time. I apologise to my hon. Friend.

The Government take very seriously illegal dumping and the abuse of licensing exemptions, which are criminal offences. I remind hon. Members that my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment announced to the House on 18 April that he is reviewing the two waste licensing exemptions that are subject to allegations of abuse—those covering recreational facilities and the improvement of agricultural land. There will be a consultation paper setting out the proposed changes to the current exemptions.

I look forward to the debate on the operation of the tax and to hearing the views of hon. Members on how we can best use the tax and credit scheme to achieve national waste policy objectives and create a more sustainable waste management system. My hon. Friend will be an active and particularly well-informed participant in that debate, but I suggest that the case for proposals such as that which he made today for a local authority challenge fund for recycling projects will be considered primarily within the spending review 2000.

1.30 pm

Mrs. Ray Michie (Argyll and Bute): I am grateful for the opportunity to debate the proposed closure of the manned meteorological station on the Island of Tiree in my constituency.

I shall begin by setting the scene, with a brief description of the island and its situation, and by welcoming the Under-Secretary of State for Defence, the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Dr. Moonie). He represents a Scottish constituency, albeit one in the central belt. He may not have visited Tiree, but I am sure that he has some idea of its location. If he has not visited Tiree, I extend a warm invitation to him to do so. He will know from the forecast on the radio that Tiree has the largest number of hours of sunshine in the United Kingdom. There is also a tremendous wind that blows all the time. I also welcome other hon. Members who have come for the debate, particularly the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Ms Jones). That may seem to be an unlikely place, in this context, but I know that she takes an interest in the island and has visited it recently.

Tiree is a jewel of an island, situated off the west coast of Scotland, a four-hour trip from Oban by Caledonian MacBrayne ferry. There is nothing beyond it, except America. The island is 11 miles long and six miles wide at its widest part, and its Gaelic name, Tir Iodh, means the land of corn. It was once known as "the granary of the islands", in the days when there was a great export trade between the islands. Its main exports now are quality sheep and cattle, or they were, before the dreadful downturn in the agriculture industry. In 1831, the population was 4,450; it is now less than 800 and falling.

I am aware of the Met Office's long and honourable history. Formed as a small department within the Board of Trade in 1854, it was taken under the wing of the Air Ministry after the first world war. Later, it moved to the Ministry of Defence, becoming, first, an executive agency and, in 1996, a trading fund.

Our debate is about the closure of the meteorological office on Tiree. The Met Office's headquarters is in Bracknell, in Berkshire. It employs over 2,000 people and five of those are employed at the office on Tiree. The Tiree station started work in 1926, and has produced valuable weather reports ever since. Five jobs does not represent much in the great scheme of things. Nevertheless, to a small community, it is the equivalent of 50 or more jobs elsewhere. The Minister will argue that the station on Tiree is not closing altogether; it is to be automated and will continue to produce weather reports. He will also argue that the five involved will not lose their jobs and that they will be relocated. Well, that would be good. However, would they prefer to live on Tiree or to be relocated to Bracknell? I suspect that that is a rhetorical question.

Tiree, which has a small and falling population and a fragile economy, will lose five jobs. Five families will be affected, and five children will be withdrawn from an excellent school, which may suffer the loss of a teacher's job.

In a written question, I asked the Secretary of State for Defence about the assessment he has made of the social and economic impact on remote and island communities of the automation of meteorological stations.

The Under-Secretary of State for Defence replied:

> This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Meteorological Office.

The Minister asked the chief executive to write to me, which he kindly did. In that letter, which is published in the written answer, he said:

> The Met Office is looking to improve efficiency and reduce costs in the delivery of weather services ... We recognise that the withdrawal of the Met Office observers from Tiree, should this be the outcome, could have an adverse impact on the local community, and this I would very much regret.—[Official Report, 18 April 2000; Vol. 348, c. 432W.]

It was very nice of him to say that, but what will he do? He did not say. What will the Minister do? He cannot shuffle off his responsibility. We are discussing not simply the automation of a weather station but the way in which the Government care for their people and what they can do to help to sustain a fragile community.

The Minister will no doubt argue that we must move with the times—new technology is the name of the game, and we are told to be cost effective and to make money. People, it seems, do not matter. I am afraid, however, that the brave new world of information technology was somewhat dented by the recent crashes in the stock market computer system and by the love letters that were sent to the House of Commons.

Can the Minister say, with hand on heart, that the quality of weather information that is gathered by an automated station is as good as, or superior to, that which is gathered by a trained expert? For example, a machine can presumably report on the height of clouds above it, but can it look around, as the human eye can, and see whether storm clouds are gathering on the horizon? I am not a technical expert, and the Minister may be able to answer my question.

The Minister will argue that the collection of weather data will still be undertaken because the Met Office will train airport staff to help regular and air ambulance flights that go to and from Tiree airport. However, I question the quality of the data that may be gathered. The main issue is primarily the loss of jobs.

Mr. Alasdair Morgan (Galloway and Upper Nithsdale): The hon. Lady shares my concerns about this matter. Is she aware that after the closure of the Shetland weather station, on at least two occasions aircraft flying to Sumburgh had to divert at the last minute because the automatic system failed to give adequate warning of changes in the weather?

Mrs. Michie: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving a good example of the worries that are felt about automation. In a moment, I shall discuss the example of Kirkwall.

The Minister will no doubt maintain that sustainable development of the islands is a matter for the Scottish Parliament and for Highlands and Islands Enterprise. The Ministry of Defence will not help if it undermines local efforts. Too often, decisions are made in Westminster without any regard to the consequences. After all, five jobs on a remote island such as Tiree must look like peanuts compared to the numbers involved in the developments between Rover and BMW, about which the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry made a statement in the House yesterday. He said:

> Our priority now is to do everything we can to help those who will be affected, to provide training and to attract new jobs to the area. That is the role of Government—to manage change and to equip people for change, not to leave them the innocent victims of change.—[Official Report, 9 May 2000; Vol. 349, c. 645.]

Today's debate highlights the fact that Tiree is to be the innocent victim of change, unless the Minister can come up with a similar answer to that given by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. That would be very welcome. The almost callous way in which these things are done is hard to take. Did the Minister or the chief executive think to inform anyone about what was to happen? Did they consult the local council in Argyll and Bute, the local community council, or the Member of Parliament?

Other stations in Scotland under threat include Kirkwall in Orkney—where concerns have been raised about the partly automated station, and about the quality of forecasting since forecasters were withdrawn—and Aviemore, the only staffed inland weather station involved with the mountain rescue service. The decision to close that station would be a rash one.

However, today's debate is about Tiree. What help or support can the Minister give? I understand that the Bracknell headquarters is to move into a modern building in another area, at a cost of millions of pounds. I suggest that a contribution could be made to the Tiree economy with, for example, financial support for the new livestock mart which has to be built to meet European Union standards. If it is not built, agriculture will suffer and more jobs will be lost.

Finally, will the Minister, in conjunction with the chief executive, examine the possibility of decentralisation by moving IT-based activities that are not geographically specific to Tiree? Why does everything have to be done at Bracknell? I hope that I have given the Minister some idea of my great concern. I thank him for listening and look forward to his reply.

1.42 pm

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mrs. Michie) and to the Minister for allowing me to intervene briefly in support of the hon. Lady's case and to enter a plea of common sense.

I am something of a weather groupie. One reason for that is that I spent most of my boyhood summer holidays on the west coast of Scotland. I am more familiar with Coll than with Tiree, but I understand the importance of any job in a rural community. That is also true in my own rural constituency, where we enjoy the Met Office C130 plane, affectionately known as "Snoopy Snack", flying in and out of Boscombe Down as part of the weather operations.

The Met Office has an annual revenue of nearly £155 million, and its largest customer is the Ministry of Defence, which contributes £55 million a year. The Civil Aviation Authority pays the Met Office £27 million a year, and other commercial customers contribute a further £21 million a year. Tiree represents a drop in the ocean. The Met Office employs 2,300 people, including 460 weather forecasters, 168 observers, 317 researchers, 825 people in computing and technical areas, 163 people in sales, marketing and other commercial areas, and nearly 250 in finance and support service posts.

The Met Office's mainframe super-computer has a peak processing power of 150 G-flops—that is, 150,000 million calculations a second—and is the fastest super-computer in Europe. A knowledge of the cost of everything and the value of nothing is one way of summing up the Met Office's approach. It grieves me to say that, because I am a huge fan of the Met Office and admire it greatly.

On relocation in the south, on 17 April 2000, at column 667 of Hansard, the hon. Member for Reading, East (Jane Griffiths) asked for a statement on the future of the Met Office and said, as a Labour Member of Parliament, that she hoped that its future location would not be in the Reading area, because the economy of the entire country needed to be considered as well as the congestion in the south-east. In the same column the Minister said that the aim of the Met Office > is to enable individuals, society and enterprises everywhere to make the most of the weather and the natural environment.—[Official Report, 17 April 2000; Vol. 348, c. 677.]

Why, therefore, is the Met Office picking on five people in Tiree?

1.46 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Dr. Lewis Moonie): I congratulate the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mrs. Michie) on securing this debate, which has allowed us to discuss an issue of great local interest and concern. I was raised in the Outer Hebrides, so I have some familiarity with the topography of the region, although it is not nearly so sunny in Stornaway as it is in Tiree, as I am sure that the hon. Lady is well aware.

I am conscious of the sensitivity of this issue, as is the chief executive of the Met Office, and I shall try to reply as fully as possible in the time available to me to the points raised by hon. Members. In addition, the chief executive would like to extend an invitation to the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute, and any other hon. Member with concerns, to visit the Met Office's headquarters at Bracknell for a full briefing on this subject and to view the organisation's admittedly centralised operations at first hand.

I shall start by putting the issue of automation into context. The Met Office, in common with the meteorological services of many other countries, has steadily increased the contribution made by automated systems to its observing networks over the past 10 years. Since the early 1990s, automatic weather observing stations have been installed at a number of locations. They have been systematically developed since inception to provide increased capability and robustness.

Although the automatic weather system was originally conceived as an aid to the observer, it has always been capable of operating totally independently, and that is already the case in many locations. However, the equipment currently deployed does not have the functionality required to allow full automation of the manned sites that comprise the basic observing network. It is the Met Office's intention to retain some manned sites, such as Lerwick, for that reason.

The automated measurement of some weather elements has, therefore, been accepted practice for many years and has enabled the Met Office to run its observational network at a much reduced cost to the taxpayer without compromising the quality of its services. As the hon. Lady will be aware, the Met Office is a Government trading fund and, as such, all its services must be paid for by customers, either directly, as in the case of commerce and industry, or indirectly through a wide variety of Government Departments.

The Met Office's customers wish to see increasing value for money. In addition, developments in forecasting require data to be available more frequently and from denser networks—for example, in the Scottish highlands—to provide improved services. Increased automation of the observational network is key to meeting those needs.

Development work has now been carried out to enable the automated measurement of additional observational elements such as radiation, sunshine and precipitation-related weather conditions, and trials are shortly to commence to assess the feasibility of extending the automation process into areas where, up to now, manual observations have been seen as necessary for the Met Office's operations. The trial, which is being conducted between May and December 2000, is the first stage of a two-year project planned to develop the observing infrastructure and to roll out automation to a number of sites, subject to a successful outcome. The initial roll-out is planned to commence with Aviemore in November 2000 and is due to be completed by December 2001, affecting approximately 11 sites throughout the United Kingdom. The automation of the manned offices in Tiree and Kirkwall is tentatively scheduled for summer 2001 and the office at Stornoway is due to be automated by the end of that year.

I stress that the manned observing offices in Scotland are being treated no differently from those in the rest of the United Kingdom. A similar proportion of stations in England are likely to be automated, given a satisfactory outcome of the trial. Moreover, the Met Office plans to retain a presence at several defence locations in Scotland. Lerwick will continue all its current activities, as well as taking on a programme of ozone measurement. That will include high altitude balloon ascents that contribute to the international monitoring of ozone depletion in the upper atmosphere and the global climate observing system.

Hon. Members have asked whether automated observations are an acceptable replacement for manual observations. As one would expect, there are advantages and disadvantages to the information from the automated equipment, when compared with information produced by an observer making visual estimates. Despite differences in the nature of automatic and manual data, the Met Office is confident that the trial will demonstrate that automatic systems can provide the data that is needed, and will not jeopardise the quality of its services. In fact, increased investment in future observational systems such as remote cameras, coupled with increased research and development, will help to make local forecasting more accurate.

I am, of course, aware that increased automation will have an impact on Met Office staff who work at the affected sites, including Tiree. I understand that the people involved already know that they will be withdrawn from their respective sites, subject to an acceptable outcome to the trial. The priority will be to find all affected staff suitable posts elsewhere in the Met Office. That will include retraining, where appropriate. Informal consultation is under way with the trade union, the Institution of Professionals, Managers and Specialists, and formal consultation is expected to take place within the next few months, once the course of the trial has become clear.

I am also conscious of the potential impact of the withdrawal of Met Office observers, should that be the outcome, on local communities. The services that are delivered by Highlands and Islands Airports Ltd. at Tiree, Kirkwall and Stornoway airports, which are essential to local aircraft operators, are likely to be particularly affected. I stress that responsibility for the provision of the aerodrome meteorological reports that are necessary for airport operations rests with HIAL, not the Met Office. Nevertheless, the Met Office entered into discussions with HIAL at the earliest opportunity to consider how HIAL could continue to provide the reports.

In the absence of Met Office observers, those discussions, which remain at an early stage, are concentrating from the outset on ensuring that HIAL staff are suitably prepared, in terms of both training and equipment, to enable them to maintain manned observing stations at Tiree, Kirkwall and Stornoway airports, should that be necessary. That will ensure the maintenance of the crucial manual elements that are required at aerodromes for observing present weather, cloud height and visibility.

I am sure that hon. Members are aware that several worries have recently been expressed, not least by the hon. and learned Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace), about the quality of forecasts produced by the Met Office for those engaged in aviation in the northern isles. Those comments have been noted with great concern by the Met Office, especially with regard to the quality of weather forecasts for Kirkwall that are provided to civil aviation, following the move of forecasting services from Kirkwall to Aberdeen some four years ago. It is true that, initially, the quality of forecasting services dropped, which was a matter of great concern. Consequently, in 1998, responsibility for Kirkwall forecasts was transferred to the weather centres at Sella Ness and Glasgow, the latter of which provided out-of-hours support. Since that transfer, the quality of aviation forecasts for Kirkwall has improved significantly, and now exceeds that which was achieved when they were produced at Kirkwall.

Notwithstanding those improvements in the quality of service, I am pleased to note that the Met Office is discussing the forecast quality issues at Kirkwall that the hon. and learned Member for Orkney and Shetland raised directly with the airline concerned. As a result of initial discussions, a new reporting system for monitoring and assuring aviation forecast quality for the northern isles is, as we speak, commencing a trial period. The aim is to ensure that the quality of the forecasts that are delivered to aircraft operators in the northern isles continues to meet the requirements of those operating in an area that can be subject to rapidly changing meteorological conditions.

Concerns have also been raised about the impact that the withdrawal of Met Office observers from Aviemore would have on safety in the surrounding mountains. There are a significant number of weather-related incidents in the Scottish mountains. For that reason, the Met Office is keen to ensure that its public safety role is enhanced, rather than diminished. It is working with other interested parties to ensure that weather information is more widely available and more comprehensive. The automation of observations at Aviemore will include the introduction of high-quality closed-circuit television, which will complement its installation at three other sites in the Scottish mountains and provide much improved coverage. Forecasters will be able to use the resulting pictures, together with other observed information, to enhance the quality of forecasts for the area.

The Met Office is also talking to the Scottish Executive and other bodies in Scotland in an effort to improve the weather services that it provides in the Scottish mountains. The talks are taking place with a view to introducing the improved services to walkers and climbers, skiers and the public at large, as well as the rescue services, before next winter.

Mrs. Michie: Even if I accept that automation will improve matters greatly, does the Ministry of Defence or the Met Office at Bracknell accept any responsibility for the impact that the withdrawal of five jobs will have on the community in Tiree?

Dr. Moonie: If I may, I shall finish the point that I was making. The introduction of automation at Aviemore should be seen not as a reduction in Met Office services or a lessening of its commitment to the Scottish mountains, but as part of what it hopes will be a major expansion.

These decisions are never taken lightly, and we recognise the importance of an admittedly small number of jobs in an area that does not have many. The Met Office must try to get the best value for money. It is constrained by the rules that govern a training fund, and by the wishes of its customers. Ultimately, its service must be dictated by those considerations. Of course, other agencies are involved, and I hope that they will be able to work with us, particularly through the Scottish Parliament, to provide alternatives. I fully accept the principle behind what the hon. Lady says. Given the increasing availability of automatic computer links, telecommunications networks and so on, it ought to be possible to decentralise many of the activities that currently take place centrally. I am sorry to say that, at present, that theoretical position is rarely matched by the will of agencies, public or private. Although there are teleworking initiatives in the highlands, which I welcome, I suspect that the process will be slow. I shall do what I can to help, but I must accept that I can do little to influence matters directly.

I deeply regret the loss of jobs— assuming that the trial is successful—in the hon. Lady's constituency, and I shall be happy to deal with any point that she wishes to raise. I would certainly welcome the opportunity to visit Tiree. I have never been there, largely because I am a terrible sailor. My youth was punctuated by remarkably intense bouts of seasickness. Of course, one can travel by air, and the boats are much better than the Loch Seaforth of the 1950s and early 1960s. I should be happy to meet the hon. Lady and discuss her concerns, and I thank her for raising this subject.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at two minutes to Two o'clock.

Science-based Innovation

[Relevant document: Second Report from the Science and Technology Committee, Session 1999-2000, HC 195.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Clelland.]

2.31 pm

Dr. Michael Clark (Rayleigh): It is my pleasure to start the debate. I sympathise with you, Mr. Deputy Speaker—the electronics in the Chamber are still being proven and the clocks are wrong. We understand that it will take a little time to get the technology working properly.

I am grateful for the opportunity to debate the Science and Technology Committee's report on innovation in the physical sciences and engineering industries. My contribution will be modest and short because other Committee members, past and present, want to speak. It is only right that they have a chance to do so because I have the privilege of being able to speak in every debate on such matters. The Minister has kindly accepted my apology for the fact that I shall have to leave the debate at 4.10 pm to Chair the Finance Bill at 4.30 pm. I will not be able to hear her response, but I promise to read it in Hansard as soon as I receive it.

Innovation starts with invention and goes on to development. I shall illustrate that by taking from my top pocket my orange Sainsbury's card—I hope that no one will reveal to the Minister responsible for science that I am using this piece of plastic for my demonstration. Way back in the early 1960s when I was a research chemist for ICI, I worked on co-polymers of polypropylene. To test the co-polymers that I was making, we used to mould a comb, which was a good mould to use because if the plastic flowed properly, it would go into the teeth of the comb and fill the comb mould. We used to test the combs—red, blue or yellow combs—in a variety of ways, one of which was to bend the comb to see whether there was any stress whitening. As hon. Members can see, as I bend my Sainsbury's card, the orange changes to white where it is stress whitened. As a research chemist, that worried me.

I had discovered that, when bent, coloured plastic would whiten through stress, but it did not please me that the combs or anything else made from my plastic, for which I obtained various patents, would distort and whiten in that way. I worked on my co-polymers until I found some that did not whiten when subject to stress. Was I not clever to work out how to get rid of that alleged defect? How much more clever would I have been had I realised that I had invented Dynotape and had I gone on to market it. Dynotape works by stress whitening coloured plastic. I used my science to get rid of the problem instead of turning my discovery into an invention and marketing it. Therefore, although I can claim to be a scientist, possibly a poor one, I cannot claim to be an innovator because I failed to discover Dynotape, even though I had the knowledge some years before the product came out.

Innovation is an inherently dynamic and evolutionary process. Somewhat like a creative idea, it can be encouraged and the correct environment can be provided to allow it to mature, but it cannot be forced. There is no doubt that innovation depends on a good science base, and we have a very good science base in the United Kingdom. Why, therefore, do we have successful innovation in biosciences but not so much innovation in the physical sciences and engineering? If we are to have innovation in the physical sciences, we must focus on marrying together scientific advances with products and processes.

For many years, the manufacturing sector has not been our strong suit, and if the manufacturing sector is not strong, there is not always a specific outlet for engineering invention. By contrast, innovation in biosciences depends on developing links between the UK's world-class biosciences base—that includes universities, charities and industries—and commercial organisations, where strong, mature links with specific applications exist, particularly in the case of applied biosciences such as drugs.

The Government's response to our report was fair and of great interest. The Government accept that they have a role to play in promoting innovation. They quoted the fact that there is an innovations unit at the Department of Trade and Industry, with 25 secondees who come from small and medium-sized enterprises, large companies, finance houses and academia. The Government readily admit that those secondees to the DTI contribute their wide experience to the Government's work on external and general policy.

The Government also accept the point made in the report that, in all aspects of engineering, whether it is electronic, civil or mechanical, the engineering community provides wealth creation and improves the quality of life for UK citizens. Only through inventiveness and keeping a technological edge on other countries—and thereby ensuring engineering sales abroad as well as at home—can the community provide that quality of life and wealth creation.

The Government–I am not speaking specifically of this Government, but of the previous one also—accept that engineering and the physical sciences are important to our national well being. However, it is disappointing to note that since 1993, UK expenditure on research and development has fallen as a percentage of the gross domestic product. The UK has had the biggest fall of any country in the G7. The Government will argue—we may hear it from the Minister—that one reason for the fall in research and development expenditure as a percentage of GDP is that GDP is rising. There is no doubt that that is one reason. However, if GDP is rising, it is beholden on the Government to try to lift research and development expenditure in line with that rise. It is easier to achieve that when GDP is rising than when it is falling. I am sure that the Government will wish to continue research expenditure.

We are fifth out the seven countries in the G7, and behind us are Canada—surprisingly—and Italy. The good news is that since 1997, there has been a check in the decline in research and development expenditure. I hope that that stable situation will now become an upturn.

Despite the disappointingly low funding for research and development, we concluded in our report—and no witnesses denied this conclusion—that our relatively poor innovation record in engineering and the physical sciences is not the result of a weakness in our science base. On the contrary, our science base is good. The science base produces more innovative ideas than are taken up commercially. The UK is strong in scientific invention, but weak at applying and exploiting those inventions. We said in our report that, to a large extent, industry is responsible for the failure to exploit inventions. We generally found a weakness in exploiting close to the market and what is close to the market is an industry rather than a Government responsibility. The Government said, fairly, that that may be true, but they did not accept that the science base itself had no responsibility for turning a good idea into an exploitable product. Indeed, the Government have gone out of their way to make it clear that the science base must turn some of its ideas into products that can be exploited and sold.

The Government say that they are encouraging that by such things as university challenge, science enterprise challenge, higher education reach out, community fund and so on, and I am glad to hear that. However, I suggest to the Minister that, excellent though those schemes are, they are diverse, rather small and poorly understood. Perhaps it would be helpful if, instead of having so many disparate schemes, the Government considered combining them, as far as possible, into larger schemes. That would cut out many of the administration costs and some of the red tape, and probably reduce some of the bidding problems that organisations experience when they are looking for money. It would be easier to understand the funding mechanism if all the schemes were rolled into one.

The Government can also help through research and development tax credits. The Select Committee discussed tax credits in the previous Parliament. The hon. Member for East Carmarthen and Dinefwr (Mr. Williams)—I am tempted to call him my hon. Friend because he is that in the Select Committee—will recall that that was discussed by the Committee before I joined. We welcome the fact that a tax credit scheme is in place for small companies. We said in our report that we thought that the Government should consider introducing a similar scheme for larger companies, although we accept that such a scheme would be expensive and that its effects would be difficult to monitor. There could also be a danger of the scheme and the money becoming unfocused. As, by and large, large companies will do research and development anyway, Government money or tax concessions are best targeted on small and medium-sized enterprises.

It is said that fear of bankruptcy and the associated stigma hinders risk taking. The United States and some continental European companies have more of what is called an enlightened approach to bankruptcy and insolvency. We asked the Secretary of State to review legislation on bankruptcy and insolvency and to introduce a distinction between responsible entrepreneurs who get into trouble and people who engage in reckless business activities. He has agreed to do so; and we look forward to considering the review and its findings in due course.

We know that the Government are thinking of relaxing the rules on exemption of personal property. In other words, if people put up their houses as security when they are inventing a product or taking risks for which they need capital, their houses will be exempted from bankruptcy proceedings. That is a good way of helping entrepreneurs. If they are risking their savings, they should not have to risk their houses as well. We must, however, be careful of taking too casual an approach and of upsetting creditors. We do not want to encourage entrepreneurs to the extent that creditors do not get paid. The creditors who supply entrepreneurs are often entrepreneurs in their own right. Driving creditors to the wall by being more lenient on some larger entrepreneurs might end up hurting the smallest of the entrepreneurs–the creditors. I urge the Government to bear in mind while they are considering new bankruptcy rules that the smaller creditors must always be remembered in any changes.

Finally, we stressed that the Government should have two key goals. First, they should ensure that there is a strong public sector and that education and the science base are properly managed and adequately financed. That is how we can find the scientific and engineering staff who are necessary to help entrepreneurs along the way. Without staff, we can have nothing. Secondly, a sound economic and fiscal environment is necessary to support those who innovate and take risks. After all, a stable environment and economy is one risk less for the serial risk takers. I know that the Government take seriously their responsibility in that regard. The additional £1 billion in the comprehensive spending review is a demonstration of their earnestness.

The population's health and living standards depend to a large extent on our innovations. The country's affluence depends on the trading products that originate from innovation and a large part of the Government's revenue comes from taxing companies and people associated with innovations from the last century. The Government would be wise to continue to ensure that the scientific goose is well looked after and properly fed if they want to maintain a steady supply of innovative golden eggs.

Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and Cleveland, East): As a member of the Select Committee, I must say that it is a pleasure to serve under the chairmanship of my hon. Friend the Member for Rayleigh (Dr. Clark). I say that in the same spirit as that in which he spoke of my hon. Friend the Member for East Carmarthen and Dinefwr (Mr. Williams).

Producing the report has been an exciting experience. It took a long time to do so—I think that 18 months passed between the moment that we started and the point at which we reached our final deliberations. The report makes many recommendations—38, I think. I want to focus on the way in which the report relates to the area that I represent: the north-east and Teesside.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Rayleigh said, the report talks about ideas of innovation and manufacturing, both of which have gone hand in glove.

I want to highlight some of those ideas, discussing in particular paragraphs 56 to 58 and recommendations (l), (m), and (n). They articulate the spirit of creating a climate of innovation and technology for small and medium enterprises.

The paragraphs deal with the need to develop proper and lasting links between innovation and finance capital. State institutions can help directly. Seedcorn funding for innovative ideas can come from universities, which in turn are helped by Government in establishing funding streams. My hon. Friend referred to the university challenge scheme, which is cited in paragraph 56 as a key agency.

Funding can come from other agencies. Local authorities may give funds directly and establish technology companies. European structural and know-how funds can assist. Money can come from local branches of Business Link and special funds directed by local training and enterprise councils. Those measures are welcome but they do not meet the central needs of small and medium employers involved in developing science-based industries. They do not help those employers to access cash to generate innovation over a longer time scale.

Much central and local state funding is geared towards direct job creation. Although high-quality jobs have been and will be created in science-based industry, they cannot always be created in the time scale required by state funders. The need for widening access to private capital funding for innovative industries is therefore imperative. Nowhere is that more important than in the manufacturing heartlands where the presence of finance capital firms is arguably weakest. I am sure that finance capital is thriving and pulsing on the M4 corridor, silicon fen and the City of London, but whether the same is true in the north-east, west Cumbria or south Yorkshire is debatable. What is not debatable is the fact that there are science and innovation-based companies in those regions.

According to the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, an estimated 23,000 people work in the sector in my region of the north-east. As one would expect, the sector is varied, ranging from pharmaceuticals to surgical instrument manufacture; from innovative chemical processes to the manufacture of optical equipment; and from software development and publishing to aerospace component manufacture. The sector is growing. The gap in high-tech employment between the north-east and the United Kingdom average reduced from 0.9 per cent. to 0.2 per cent. from 1991 to 1997.

There is still room for growth. Growth in key areas has been aided by the strategic decisions of companies based in the region to diversify their product range and to move from core products to higher value-added manufacturing. That has been especially true of the chemical industry, which is still the major player on Teesside. At £28,750, the emerging bio-science sector has, with the pharmaceutical sector, the highest research and development investment per employee in the region, especially compared with the software and IT industries.

The regional firms are based on the logistics of what some wish to call the old economy—characterised by large size, defined production and supply-chain requirements. Paradoxically, those firms provide lucrative opportunities for small IT companies in the application of bespoke software and systems. A local pool of talent has been established, often based on the original work of the regional universities in setting up specialist computing and software centres.

The regional IT industry continues to grow apace. It is often driven forward by spin-offs from the academic and business worlds, which have the flexibility to map the market and to attach themselves to the needs of large companies and key players in the public sector that have the same IT needs. However, as I said earlier, those new players need capital financing if they are to overcome structural issues in their field of work. The most important one is that core professionals, whether IT specialists, graduate engineers or chemists, are in a sellers' market. They can attract premium salaries from anywhere in the UK or, indeed, the world. They work in a global environment and have no cultural inhibitions about doing so. We want them to stay in the region or in our country, so that their expertise can be used for its economic and social good.

The ways to make that happen are, first, reinforcing their core employment, through the work of regional universities and technology and innovation centres, and secondly, enabling their potential to be fully backed by finance capital, which can help employers grow and prosper, as well as, in future, back the ideas of key people for the creation of new companies and firms. That was the type of research and finance infrastructure that underpinned the development of silicon valley. That valley around Santa Clara grew into one of the world's economic powerhouses.

There is no reason why we cannot recreate that effect in my region, the north-east of England, or in other regions. Perhaps the key issue is the cultural conservatism of the finance sector. It is all too easy to demonstrate the innate profitability of a new property development, a new out-of-town shopping or leisure park or executive housing. It is probably slightly harder to convince a hard-headed banker of the innate profitability of a new manufacturing process—even one in a mature industry or promoted by a market leader. Now that the dot.com bubble has burst, it will be much harder to convince a venture capitalist of the worth of a new and untested approach to production innovation or an entirely new product or new IT application that exists only in cyberspace or the head of the program writer.

How should we go about breaking down that cultural barrier? The Science and Technology Committee's recommendation in paragraph 57 of the report makes a start. The suggestions of the Bank of England witnesses about the creation of a new breed of intermediaries, whom they call venture catalysts, could help. Those people could act as points of reference for scientists and high-tech entrepreneurs and for the finance capital industry. They could help to demystify science-based projects for the venture capitalists, to show that seemingly arcane ideas can have both relevance and profit potential. They could also help to prepare people whose only previous experience of planning has been in marshalling scientific and technological ideas for development to explore the arcane arts of preparing robust business plans.

The Committee suggests that the vehicle for setting up and resourcing a network of such venture catalysts could be the local branches of Business Link. I strongly agree. It is an excellent idea and I recommend it to the Minister. The Business Link network in the north-east, which is changing into the new small business service, now possesses the range of contacts and institutional advisers needed to undertake such a task.

Recommendation (n) in paragraph 58 of the report argues in support of business angels, because they have a valuable role to play in helping to provide risk capital to small unquoted companies. The report defines business angels as people who possess a specific expertise in an area of industry, a good informal network of like-minded people and access to liquid reserves. Such people often have the flexibility to fill the gap between normal SME debt finance provided by the clearing banks, and the higher amounts deemed worthy by venture capitalists who, as ever, must look to future rates of return. They are becoming increasingly important in backing high-tech firm formation.

According to the Bank of England, registered business angels have made 227 investments in 223 registered companies, the majority of which were technology-based companies. That is a good start, but it is still below the level in competitor countries, most notably the United States.

The Department of Trade and Industry has researched the matter and argues that the need to create a network of intermediaries to match such active finance entrepreneurs with science-based fledgling businesses is the key to squaring the circle. However, we do not want to create yet another charmed circle of advisors and mentors who are based in areas where science-based industries are already flourishing. Left to market forces and identified opportunity alone, the cash will merely gravitate to the south-east.

The Committee and I believe that the key is to house such activities in the new regional development agencies. The RDA in my region—One NorthEast—has already risen to the challenge and identified the growth sectors that it wants to back. Those sectors are coterminous with the nationally identified, high-tech and emerging sectors in the competitiveness White Paper that was published in December 1998. One NorthEast's regional economic strategy boldly gives prominence to backing the region's universities and building on the interface between science, universities and local business institutions. It recognises the opportunities that can arise from the spin-out and licensing of university research and development, and the way in which the network of innovation centres and technology institutes that are based in the north-east can help those opportunities to be realised.

The Committee seeks to build on those living, breathing initiatives by introducing a new role that marries scientific and innovation know-how to the availability of cash backing for growth. I know that the One NorthEast board, senior management and the technology community in my region will greet that enthusiastically.

Historically, the north-east has been the birthplace of technology in communications, mining, engineering, technological applications in metal manufacture and in chemicals and electronics that has changed the world. The regional finance networks of town banks brought those technologies to the market. Unfortunately, that finance network no longer exists. However, the region now stands at the dawn of a new technological age. Marrying the skills, talents and abilities that I know exist in my region to the availability of finance capital is the key issue.

The report contains many exciting proposals that should all be implemented regionally, to provide finance, as well as across the country, with the support of business angels. I urge the Government to adopt many of the new ideas. I know that my hon. Friend the Minister for Small Business and E-Commerce has already responded positively. I hope that the points on which I have focused regarding the north-east will receive a warm welcome from her.

3.4 pm

Mr. Alan W. Williams (East Carmarthen and Dinefwr): I am pleased to take part in this debate on innovation in physical science and engineering, and to follow both the hon. Member for Rayleigh (Dr. Clark), the Chairman of the Select Committee on Science and Technology, and my hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough, South and Cleveland, East (Dr. Kumar), who placed such a strong emphasis on manufacturing. I know that you, too, Mr. Deputy Speaker, believe strongly in our manufacturing industries. I read a chart yesterday in which Wales was the third of all regions in Britain in terms of the overall percentage of gross domestic product based in manufacturing industry. The west midlands ranked the highest.

The report is an important document. I have taken part in Select Committees during my 12 years in Parliament, and in the Science and Technology Committee in particular since its inception in 1992. During the previous Parliament, we undertook a major inquiry into genetics, particularly the human genome project, and we also examined the work of the Natural Environment Research Council and the Particle Physics and Astronomy Research Council.

At the outset of the present Parliament, the Select Committee realised that it had left engineering and physical science relatively uncovered in the previous Session, so we set out to make up that shortfall. When we took our decisions in 1997, I did not realise that we would be so thorough in examining engineering and physical science. Our terms of reference were drawn up in October 1997 and the report was published in February this year—two and a half years later—after a mammoth effort.

Several visits took place. I particularly remember our visit to Gordon Edge at his impressive establishment at Generics in Cambridge. We also visited Oxford Instruments and St. John's innovation centre at Oxford. We went to the United States, where we visited the Massachusetts institute of technology in Boston. It was a culture shock to encounter in Massachusetts the attitude towards applying science to innovation in manufacturing. The visit was most illuminating. The Committee also visited Germany unfortunately, I could not go on that occasion, but I had been there on an earlier Select Committee visit. Germany is certainly a world leader in technological innovation and the quality of its engineering industries. We also conducted 20 oral evidence sessions with a variety of bodies. All that is distilled in our report.

The first question put to me, as to our Chairman earlier, was why we are more successful as a nation at innovation in the biological than in the physical sciences. I do not know exactly why, although I had some preconceptions. As the report mentions, we need to invest far more heavily in development for the physical sciences. The majority of investment in the biological sciences is for research. The development side of research and development is more expensive in the engineering and physical sciences. I shall return to that issue later.

There may be a problem with our research council structure. The Particle Physics and Astronomy Research Council necessarily does pure, blue-sky research. It is 100 per cent. academic, but there are massive spin-offs from its academic pursuits. The Biotechnology and Biological Sciences Research Council and the Medical Research Council are obviously more medical and have strong links with the pharmaceutical industry. The linkage between industry and academia is stronger in those research councils. It is a bit of an anomaly that the Engineering and Physical Science Research Council is rather blue sky. One would have expected it to have stronger links with our manufacturing industries.

I visited Oxford with Peter Williams, the chairman of Oxford Instruments, who is a distinguished figure on many committees. It was a revelation to discover that he felt that the work of the EPSRC is blue sky. Its entire emphasis is academic. He is greatly involved in the application of research ideas, but he felt that, if we train scientists to think, learn and understand science and pursue research at the highest level, they can turn their minds equally efficiently to applied science once they have completed their degrees or doctorates. I still feel that the EPSRC needs to be looked at by its senior members. It is something of an anomaly that the MRC is more focused on applied science than the EPSRC.

The Government, in their reply to the Select Committee's report, refer to the need for a greater onus on the science base in those areas to reach more strongly towards innovation. Like our Chairman, my feeling throughout our inquiry was that the science base in Britain is strong. Obviously there are some concerns that, as higher education has expanded, there has been a large influx of students in the arts and non-sciences, but no equivalent expansion in physical science and engineering. I am reassured that the quality of people in universities is good and that the science base is producing people with plenty of ideas.

Britain is as inventive now as it was 20, 50 or 100 years ago. Without doubt, we are producing the ideas. There is unanimity this afternoon and all our witnesses were unanimous in believing that the British genius for invention is abundantly there. It is a question of harnessing those ideas. The inventiveness that we associate with our universities can be developed in their research departments. It is found in individuals too, sometimes quite surprisingly. One thinks of James Dyson and his Cyclone and how he produced an entirely new type of vacuum cleaner. He went into manufacturing and learned the skills as he went along.

I do not know whether Trevor Bayliss has any academic qualifications in physics or in engineering, but his presentation to us and his clockwork radio and other inventions were very challenging. Those of us who have come through it think that school, A-levels and higher education is the conveyor belt that produces inventors. Obviously there is another conveyor belt, or perhaps it is not a conveyor belt at all. People out there are thinking all the time in a challenging way. Trevor Bayliss's idea of an academy of inventors sounded a bit strange; nevertheless, I see what he means. That idea is moving forward.

At the evidence session that I chaired with the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency, I was greatly impressed by its director, John Chisholm. He said that, for the past decade, DERA and the defence establishment had been bursting with ideas that could be applied. Those ideas have been thought out and developed with their application to defence in mind, but they would be available to harness if we had different objectives. The public-private partnership that we are developing for DERA might, therefore, give the organisation the commercial freedom to consider other objectives, release some of its energies and develop.

It is important that there is a multiplicity of organisations to develop ideas and turn them into useful products. In that respect, Generics in Cambridge has a wonderful structure. We had a presentation on the Cambridge phenomenon and how dozens of highly successful companies at the forefront of technology have set up there and created tens of thousands of jobs—so many that they are running out of space. I wish that such centres of excellence existed around all our universities. Obviously, there are examples in Oxford, too, such as St. John's innovation centre. Science parks are developing around all our higher education centres.

My visits reminded me of the visits that we made to the Fraunhofer, Steinbeis and Max Planck institutes in Germany in 1995 in connection with an inquiry into parallel areas. We are making the necessary changes a little later than Germany, which has a well-evolved middle tier that combines universities and higher education in one broad stream. Industry is out there, too. That middle tier permits the fertilisation of ideas, and networks are developing between higher education and industry. That middle tier is important because it is where ideas can be developed into useful products.

The topic of technology foresight was raised with most of the Committee's witnesses. It was introduced in 1993, and the forward look which is published every year is of value. There were some critical assessments of it, but its great value is in establishing more and more networks. There are opportunities for people to meet and exchange ideas across disciplines. Members of the Royal Society of Chemistry talked to the Committee, and one idea that stuck in my mind was car boot sales—inexpensive collections of scientists in different areas meeting to discuss topics—

Dr. Michael Clark: Stolen ideas.

Mr. Williams: To share and develop ideas that they found successful.

One criticism of technology foresight was that ideas were not filtering down sufficiently to small and medium enterprises—the SMEs. Large companies have their own technology foresight and their own ideas, and they learn something from the relevant publications and the work that goes into preparing them. However, those ideas require greater diffusion downwards.

[Mr. Williams]

As regards the Committee's American visit, the MIT has an incredible record in setting up businesses. I cannot remember how many of the world's great multinational companies had their origins in Boston. I read chemistry at Oxford; it was a very good course and I carried on for my DPhil, but it was a purely academic discipline. We did not talk about industry, or about pollution and so on; nothing was said on the application of science or on its downside. I learned about those after I had left university. I enjoyed all the work, but 5 or 10 per cent. of the course should have been about application, and the importance of ICI, Glaxo and the other trading companies, and about the negatives, the problems of pollution, chemicals in the environment and so on.

At MIT, applied science is as important as pure science and great pride was taken in the application of science to improve the quality of life and the economy of the United States. Management is taught as a component of degree courses. That was certainly not the case when I was at university. I visited a school of manufacturing industry in Cambridge where management is part of degree and postgraduate courses.

During the 1960s and 1970s, MIT had public funding from defence industry projects, but in the 1980s and 1990s, because of the peace dividend, the amount of available public funding on which MIT could draw diminished, so it had to diversify. It went to companies in different parts of the United States, looked at their products and offered its services to improve product design. It was a kind of outreach from MIT into industry. The contracts resulting from that innovation replaced much of the defence money that was lost. That was a culture change; no British university or science park has done quite the same thing, although having the institutions on which to develop is a start.

The American approach is more adventurous and risk taking; the word "entrepreneur" came up many times. The venture capital industry is much more developed in the United States than it is in Britain, but in the Department of Trade and Industry and the Treasury such thinking is being put into practice. We know what works in the United States, and if we want to take its good features and incorporate them into the British economy we can do so.

The Guardian on 8 May, quoting the prelude to a speech by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer about venture capital, stated:

> UK pension funds invest only 0.5 per cent. of their funds in venture capital, compared to 5 per cent. in the US.

We all know that, but in the past few years there has been a tenfold difference in the proportion of Britain's wealth that is available for new ideas and new companies in venture capital. It was no surprise to me that, when the dark clouds loomed over the west midlands and the Government and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry were working on the rescue of Rover by the Phoenix group, the money came not from a British bank but from an American bank, which eventually guaranteed the £200 million required. Unfortunately, the City is risk averse. I do not know how we can tackle that, but my right hon. Friend the Chancellor made suggestions in his speech last Tuesday to the trustees of pension funds and the consultants whom they hire. Something is amiss institutionally when we are afraid of putting the wealth that we have created behind British industry or the newer ideas and small ventures in British industry.

The Select Committee's Chairman, the hon. Member for Rayleigh, mentioned the role of tax incentives. In a previous Select Committee, Jeremy Bray, the former Member for Motherwell, South and science spokesman for the Labour Opposition for several years, was a regular and powerful advocate of tax incentives for research and devélopment. He produced research evidence showing how effective they can be. I was pleased that, in earlier Budgets, the Government recognised that fact and offered considerable help to small and medium enterprises. I echo the words of the hon. Member for Rayleigh. The Government should consider extending those schemes to large companies.

Even given the expense, the problems of definition and other matters, our record on research and development in industry is disappointing. In the scoreboard that is published every year, we are fifth out of the seven. We languish there, just about holding our own, and we should not be there. People in Britain have many ideas that could be developed, and we should be climbing that league. If the Government used our surpluses to extend some of the schemes that already exist for research and development, they would receive a good return on that investment.

The report also discusses the role of demonstration projects, about which I hope my hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford (Mr. Beard) will talk later. That is another difference between engineering and physical sciences and biological and medical research. In scaling up, development involves large costs. The Government should offer more help for those demonstration projects.

I have called for Government help, so I must mention the £22 billion that the mobile phone licences will raise. All sorts of people have made all sorts of claims on that money.

Dr. Kumar: People such as pensioners.

Mr. Williams: Yes, pensioners and the health service have claims, and Wales has asked for matched funds. However, I understand that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor is wisely thinking of using the money to pay off Government debt, so there will be no quick decision on its use.

I suggest that the best use of the money would be to help science research and development. The money came from innovation in the engineering and physical science-based industries, and the best support for long-term development would be to put that £22 billion—which will, I believe, arrive in a cash stream of about £2 billion a year for the next 10 years—into the science budget. It could provide incentives for research and development and improve the infrastructure. Our report describes many of those ideas in detail, and I hope that the Department of Trade and Industry will seriously take them into account.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Nicholas Winterton): Having called three doctors in succession, I now intend to break that sequence, although I shall call somebody with considerable experience of an important industry.

3.30 pm

Mr. Nigel Beard (Bexleyheath and Crayford): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. As this is my last connection with the Science and Technology Committee, I should like to say how enjoyable and stimulating it has been to work with other Committee members, especially the Chairman, the hon. Member for Rayleigh (Dr. Clark), whom I also regard as an hon. Friend in this context. The experience has been exhilarating and enjoyable.

Innovation is a topic on which much has been written and on which there is a substantial body of research. The high reputations and hands-on experience of the witnesses who mapped out common ground were a distinctive feature of the inquiry. There was a substantial consensus on innovation, although it was not entirely uniform. The volume of evidence that is published with the report will be a good source of information for planners, policy makers and students. The report is a good distillation of the understanding that was derived from witnesses and of the conclusions that flowed from that understanding.

We began by considering why Britain is good at innovation based on the biological sciences but poor at innovation based on engineering and the physical sciences. That clear perception shaped our terms of reference and the course of the inquiry. If we contrast the history of the pharmaceuticals industry in Britain with the history of the motor car industry, the machine tool industry, the electronics industry and engineering more generally, we see that the truth of that observation is beyond question. That view came out strongly from our witnesses. No one dissented from it.

There was also substantial agreement on the nature of innovation. There was common agreement among the witnesses, but the word "innovation" is often used loosely. Therefore, it is important to say what it is not: it is not synonymous with research and development, science, invention or technology. Academic discussion often equates innovation with academic interests and research or with research that is sponsored by the Engineering and Physical Sciences Research Council and the Biotechnology and Biological Sciences Research Council. Those perform vital functions that generate ideas, but in themselves they are not innovation.

Innovation involves the presentation of a new product to a market or a new process to commercial production. It means generating new ideas and understanding the function of research, including research that is supported by the Government through research councils and universities. Innovation identifies what a defined market is likely to require, which is the process of market research or market investigation. It brings together various technologies to satisfy that market demand as part of the process of design and development. Innovation establishes a manufacturing process, known as process development, which is sometimes overlooked. Finally, it means commercially launching a product on to the market. Innovation can fail at any one of those stages. To discover the cause of our poor performance, we must take into account that range of stages, and not purely the scientific beginnings of research.

That definition or model of innovation was widely agreed by the Confederation of British Industry, the OECD, MIT and industry in general, so there is no ambiguity about the meaning of innovation. Against that background, why are bioscience-based industries different from engineering and physical science-based industries? The essential difference is this. If one takes pharmaceuticals as the most obvious bioscience-based industry, the risk lies in successful research and the effectiveness and safety of a drug being proved by the regulatory process. Once that has been done, the marketing is a subsidiary activity, because the disease targeted by the drug is self-evident. Marketing and manufacturing are not risky; research carries the greatest burden of risk. The situation is very different in engineering and physical science-based industries. Understanding what the market wants and adapting various technologies to meet that through the process of development is difficult, risky and increasingly expensive. There may be very little need for new research in the process of innovation based on physical science and engineering—much of the research may have been done years before, perhaps topped up by more recent research. The difference is that there is far greater dependence on market research and development, which distinguishes engineering and physical science-based industries from innovation in the pharmaceutical and agrichemical industries.

What is the diagnosis of why innovation is weak in engineering and physical science-based industries? The situation is summed up by a quotation from the Select Committee's report:

> Market research, design and development are skimped, underfunded and inadequate in engineering and physical science based companies.

Dr. Michael Clark: I am following the hon. Gentleman's speech with great interest. I am interested in the distinction that he makes between innovation in physical sciences and innovation in biological sciences. To put it in a nutshell, does he agree that, in the case of biological sciences, there is a market—namely, a disease—that desperately wants a product, but in the case of engineering and physical sciences, the product desperately wants a market?

Mr. Beard: There is a great deal of truth in that. To put it in similar terms to those used by the hon. Gentleman, the difference is that in the biological sciences, it is a matter of science push, because the markets are identifiable, but in engineering and physical sciences, it is a matter of market pull. That is where the difference in performance and complexity lies.

As I have mentioned, development is an expensive process. In many cases, that process must end with a prototype or a demonstration project to see how things work. It is frequently a matter of putting together disparate technologies, and the process of development is in making them work harmoniously for the purpose in hand. As my hon. Friends have mentioned, there is substantial evidence that expenditure on that is skimped. Aeronautical developments tend to be carried out by force of circumstances because people want to see aeroplanes fly, but in other areas development is not carried through to the extent that is necessary to demonstrate to a market that a product is viable and useful. It is in those areas of development and market assessment that Japanese and American strength lies. That is why, although Britain generates so many ideas from the fertile soil of research, things invented here are so often made commercial in America and Japan. We should aim to avoid that if we are to become a knowledge-based economy, with our prosperity benefiting fully from the fruits of our rich, national ingenuity.

A subordinate aspect to the question why we are not as good as America and Japan at developing ideas is summed up in a phrase coined by MIT—the "dignity of applied knowledge". Too often, the academic attitude in Britain is that pure science is more important, which is where the good brains go, and that the second-class brains go for applied science. That is futile, stupid and plainly wrong. I have spent a substantial part of my career in applied science, and I can say from first-hand experience that the intellectual challenge of applying science is just as great, and in many instances greater, than making the initial discovery and doing the research, because it is far more complex. That myth must be ruthlessly dispelled.

We must also stress—this comes up time and again in Government policy—that our failure is not a failure to generate new ideas. We may say it, but our actions go against it. As the report says, there is no evidence of any shortage of ideas and knowledge emerging from engineering and physical science research undertaken in universities and industry. The science base undoubtedly needs protecting. It was certainly going downhill, and it is to the Government's immense credit that they made £1.4 billion available, in addition to the money that came from the Wellcome Trust, to ensure that that did not continue. We must be vigilant to ensure that the science base remains healthy, but we should not pretend that we are doing something substantial to cure our failure in innovation, which is the subject of today's debate.

The position is not a happy one. Indeed, it is worsening. Nor is the problem new. It goes back at least to the 1970s, but it is getting worse. University research is directed to acquiring knowledge; so is the work of research councils. The development side of the process is universally the responsibility of industry. Only industry can bring together the technological know-how, the finance, the capacity to make a commercial product and the necessary market. No amount of extra money for universities will improve development: it is essentially a job for industry.

We should therefore consider the Department of Trade and Industry's research and technology scoreboard and some of the other published figures which are available. Business enterprise research and development—for the reasons that I gave earlier, it is the main source of development expenditure—has grown more slowly in Britain than in any other developed nation. In 1970, we were second to the United States, but we are now fifth. That is well illustrated by figure 2 on page xvi of the report. The DTI's scoreboard shows that trend to be concentrated in the industries that we are discussing. That is illustrated in figure 4 on page xviii, which shows that, in investment in research and development, the pharmaceuticals industry holds its own compared with its world competitors.

Calculated as a proportion of turnover, the engineering and machinery, electronics and electrical, software and information industries spend on what is called R and D, but is actually development, between a quarter and a half of what their international competitors spend. We cannot sustain that position. The picture will not improve if we fall further and further behind while our competitors in this era of development continue to build up more and more resources. The picture is clearly set out in paragraphs 16 to 35 of the report. For anyone who takes an interest in the future of manufacturing industry, as you do, Mr. Deputy Speaker, those paragraphs make grim reading. For anyone who believes that manufacturing cannot be allowed to disappear from the spectrum of economic activities, the report points to something that must be corrected.

I hope that those paragraphs will serve as the starting point for a plan of action when the Government publish a White Paper on innovation—one, we hope, without any tokenism or misdiagnosis. The Government response to our report is, at the least, complacent, if not monumentally complacent, and is redolent of a lack of understanding of the actual state of UK industry. Paragraph 10 on page 3 of the response states:

> The Government acknowledges that the UK expenditure on research and development is not as high as some of its international competitors and could be better.

That is in the light of all the evidence in those other paragraphs and figures. The Government respond to our report as though they were a parent receiving a school report saying that their child had just fallen behind in class. Their response does not reflect the seriousness of the position. It does not reflect the fact that spending on research and development continues on a downward spiral.

A little further down in the same paragraph, the Government response continues:

> However, recent figures, just published, show an arrest of the 1993-97 decline in the UK's gross expenditure on research and development as a ratio of GDP.

That decline has been going on since the 1970s and the figures in our report show that it continues. At best, the Government pick out one figure and claim that the past 20 years have been wiped out, that that one figure shows that the trend has changed and that we do not need to bother about this any more. That is exactly what is said in the third quotation to which I should like to refer:

> A continued improvement in gross expenditure on research and development into the future would indicate an increasing focus on innovation and research and development as key drivers in the knowledge-based economy.

That is Dr. Chadman personified. We have one favourable figure, which is not quoted, and we suddenly live in the best of all possible worlds. The complacency reflected there makes one question the adequacy of the advice that the Government are receiving. They deserve immense credit for what has already been done for the science base, but that is not what we are discussing. I hope that, when the Select Committee responds to that Government paper, it will request a fuller reply to the points that it made in paragraphs 16 to 42 of its report. The scope for Government action may be limited, but that is no excuse for deceiving oneself and ignoring a major national issue.

I would not quarrel with Government policy in general. The central purposes of Government policy on science and innovation have been to secure a healthy science and engineering base—they have achieved that—and to provide trained and experienced scientists who can go out into industry or staff research organisations throughout the country. Those are proper priorities for the Government. Everyone in industry would recognise that there is no substitute for that work, as they cannot do it for themselves. Everyone in industry would also recognise that the research and development that is done by universities and research councils should be speculative, and that a large proportion of it should be blue-sky work, as industry cannot undertake such research itself. People in industry are the appliers of science, not the Government.

The Government aim to secure better transfer of science and technology from academia to small and medium companies, which is an excellent ambition. However, it should be plainly stated that, if those small and medium organisations do not put money into development, there will be nowhere for ideas from academia to transfer to. Something must be done to ensure prosperity in that respect.

I am a great supporter of the Faraday centres, about which the Government have set out some details. They are modelled on the Fraunhofer centres which we all saw in Germany, which are a good example of how transfer can be achieved and small and medium companies can improve their capacity for development. They provide a good bridge enabling scientists and technologists to come from academia. Such people can enter intermediate organisations, become familiar with the needs of industry and then move on; in other words, they have it both ways. We have an urgent problem in this respect. Germany is doing well with the centres and has a record of doing well with them. It has 40-odd institutions, whereas we are talking about eight. One of the besetting and pervasive sins in this field is tokenism. We see a problem on which everybody agrees and then say that we are doing something on the basis of one example. Such an approach does not deal with problems adequately.

The report provides an excellent model of innovation and an excellent diagnosis of where this country's problems lie. I hope that, as one of the major outcomes of the report, the forthcoming White Paper on innovation will take that model and diagnosis as a beginning and address the problems. In the past, we have put money into the early stage, but not into where the difficulty lies—development. We must tackle that problem one way or the other. It might be tackled by introducing the sort of tax credits that have been mentioned. I agree with my colleagues that such a scheme needs consideration in relation to larger companies. Although a large part of innovation comes through small companies, a substantial proportion will come from big, established companies, which are as guilty as anybody of not investing adequate resources in development.

The field of tokenism must go, so the White Paper on innovation must also provide a coherent policy and get rid of the bewildering array of schemes and devices. It should provide a single policy that clearly addresses the problems set out in the report and that everybody understands. We must stop the game of bidding here and bidding there, which makes securing work in the academic research field similar to visiting a fairground and bidding at various boutiques. That should stop. We must have a national viewpoint on where the issues are and on how we are addressing them. We should then monitor how well we perform against those targets.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We now return to the sequence of doctors, so I call Dr. Lynne Jones.

3.54 pm

Dr. Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I agree with many of the comments made by the previous speakers, who went into considerable detail about the report and the Government's response. Like my hon. Friend the Member for East Carmarthen and Dinefwr (Mr. Williams) I was a member of the Science and Technology Committee in the previous Parliament and participated in the production of a report in 1994 on innovative and competitive technology. Between then and January this year, when the report that we are considering was published, I was struck forcibly by the fact that the Government have taken on board many of the concerns about financial incentives for more investment in research and development. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford (Mr. Beard) emphasised, the incentives and support still very much relate to the research phase.

It is still early days to judge whether the tax incentives will have a substantial impact. More important is that people in companies and research organisations should understand the importance of research and development and of good market research and management in the creation of wealth. People in organisations are the driving force behind investment in research and development, development of new technologies and putting research ideas into the market. The Government have worked to create incentives for investment, but perhaps we have not focused enough on the importance of well-trained people and of the movement of people between sectors, for example from universities and research institutes into business and vice versa.

Many witnesses from business pointed out how difficult it was for them to recruit people who not only had academic qualifications but were of high calibre. There was a distinct shortage. I echo the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford about the Government's complacency in their response—that we are perhaps doing as well as other countries. Even on our visit to America, the country that we are supposed to emulate, people spoke of a shortage of highly educated people with innovative ideas and the research experience and management understanding needed to get them off the ground. We can see that effect, because in the United States and, to an extent, in this country, Governments must relax visa requirements for foreign nationals to come to the developed world. Germany is looking to recruit the well-educated work force of Russia and the United States also wants to recruit abroad. Unfortunately, many of our best people are being enticed by those recruitment activities.

That does not matter, as long as the necessary to-ing and fro-ing of people goes on. If it is a two-way process, that is all well and good. People go to other countries, pick up experience and come back. The problem in this country is that it is a one-way process. The important role of scientists and engineers is not acknowledged. People get poor rewards, especially in the public sector, in our universities and our research institutions, in terms of not only salaries but equipment and technical support. People used to come back but are now staying away.

I hope that at the next comprehensive spending review the Government will consider the need to do something about the poor pay and conditions of our academic staff, especially in science and engineering. Many of the vice-chancellors who have provided evidence to our Committee and in written communications to me have noted how difficult it is to retain trained staff. That is especially true in IT, a sector in which people can double their salary by leaving academia. There is no problem with people leaving academia and having experience in the private sector. The problem is that they should also be coming back—there should be a two-way process.

The Government need to be even more hands on. They have been careful in their response to distinguish the role of the private sector in the marketplace. They have wanted a hands-off approach to business development and market investigations. I was struck when we went to Boston, and to the United States generally, that there is far more public-sector intervention in such areas.

We met representatives of the Massachusetts Technology Collaborative, which was founded by the state. It is an independent public economic development organisation. The state governor appoints the board members. It has gone out and sought to identify and develop clusters. In the Government's response to our report, they say that they cannot create clusters, but that has been shown not to be the case in countries such as the United States.

We saw evidence of the success of the Massachusetts Technology Collaborative. It has been behind the establishment of five clusters. Its encouragement of the clusters in health care especially, but also in other areas, has promoted spontaneous development elsewhere. It took public sector intervention to get matters moving.

We visited the Massachusetts Technology Development Corporation, which is also a state institution. It started more than 20 years ago with a $10 million endowment. The organisation provides small sums of venture capital—between $750,000 and $2 million—to start up companies with a technological idea. Interestingly, the corporation told us how important it was for it to be involved in the management of the companies. It had a policy of taking a share in companies' equity. As a result, the initial endowment has turned over several-fold. For every $1 invested in venture capital, $17.50 is coming back for investment, so the cycle can continue.

We met the director of VenturCom, one of the companies that had been helped. It had the advantage of state support, venture capital and business advice, which brought the engineer—the scientist with the ideas—together with managers. A British manager was involved in that company and the state had provided it with the assistance. The fact that it was close to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology meant that the company had access to cutting-edge research and skilled technicians. So the state created the means by which those companies could thrive.

When we went to Germany, we visited the Herzogenrath technology park. Herzogenrath is a small town with a population of 44,000. Its technology park helps to start up companies by providing business advice as well as a physical infrastructure. It was set up with public money of DM80 million. That level of investment in a small town of 44,000 people would be the envy of cities as large as Birmingham, which cannot secure such an amount.

In our recommendations, we asked the Government to ensure that regional development agencies in conjunction with local authorities had access to adequate capital to develop such business parks and other incubator programmes for new companies. It is disappointing that the only response was that the Chancellor had announced additional funding of £50 million for research and development agencies throughout England. It is better than nothing, but nowhere near the level of state support provided in other countries such as the United States and Germany, which have a better record than we do in promoting links between companies and the engineering and physical sciences.

My final point was not specifically addressed in our report. After it was produced, I attended a seminar at the Royal Society, which was promoted by the Foundation for Science and Technology. The seminar was entitled "UK Missing a Multi-Billion Pound Industry?", which referred to the environmental industry. An important theme that emerged was the Government's role in passing legislation to help new technologies to flourish.

John Waters, the director of an environmental resources management company employing environmental consultants, told us that legislation was the driving force behind the development of environmental technologies. He pointed out that the United Kingdom has only an 8 per cent. share of environmental technology services world wide, compared with Germany's 21 per cent. and 18 per cent. in the United States. Governments in countries where those technologies had taken off had imposed stricter regulations—perhaps providing greater disincentives to polluters—and had invested with the private sector in these important technologies, which have so much potential for future wealth creation.

When talking about future wealth creation, I must mention the car industry. I represent a Birmingham constituency. We are extremely pleased that the Phoenix consortium will continue to run Rover at Longbridge and that there is some hope for the future of that organisation. However, in the long term we must diversify our industries and look at new technologies. Companies like Rover should be at the cutting edge of the development of new environmentally sound vehicles, whether for public or private use. The Government must do far more to encourage such developments.

That brings me on quite neatly to endorse the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for East Carmarthen and Dinefwr when he mentioned the large capital asset that the Government are sitting on as a result of the sale of the mobile phone licences. It may surprise hon. Members, but I am not one of those who support spending some of that £22.5 billion on increasing pensions. It is unsound economics to use a capital sum for expenditure that has on-going revenue consequences. Equally, if that money is just being used to pay off the national debt, it would be a wasted opportunity to use it for investment in activities that will create more wealth in this country in terms of business and tax revenues for the Chancellor.

It would be a terrible waste to use all that money merely to pay off debt. Of course, it will mean that an extra £1 billion a year will come in for the Chancellor that could be used to support increased pensions, but the tax revenues are buoyant enough to increase pensions without resorting to such methods. If that money were invested in our public organisations, universities and research institutes, notwithstanding the extra £1 billion that was put in as a result of the comprehensive spending review last year, it still does not get us back up to the proportion of our national wealth that went into research and development 20 or 30 years ago.

I entirely endorse the comments made by my hon. Friend the Member for East Carmarthen and Dinefwr on this matter. This windfall has come as a result of technological advancement. The first time I had a mobile phone was when I was a parliamentary candidate in the 1992 election. We hired them for a few weeks and they were great big things. Technology has advanced so much that we now have a tremendous product that has created jobs and wealth in this country and this remarkable windfall for the Chancellor.

I commend the Government for the way in which they managed the auction and succeeded in getting such a large sum. It would be a terrible waste to use that for redeeming debt when there is no pressure on Government borrowing and we are well within the Maastricht criteria for debt. Pension funds and the private sector are crying out for more Government borrowing because they need more Government gilts, of which there is a desperate shortage. Using the money to pay off debt would be a bit like the servant in the parable of the talents who buried the money that his master had given him rather than investing it for real returns in the future.

My plea to the Government is to fund science infrastructure. I know that our report said that the problem was business development, not science infrastructure, but that still has to be maintained and improved. Putting money into infrastructure will assist business and that is the kind of advice given in other countries.

The Government take seriously their role in fostering innovation and wealth creation; I hope that they will look again at the report and at some of the suggestions on how to use the massive windfall to ensure that the country prospers in the future.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Following the reference to the parable of the talents, we now turn to the talents of a civil engineer. I call Mr. David Chidgey.

4.16 pm

Mr. David Chidgey (Eastleigh): I am not a member of the Committee, and I congratulate its members on an excellent report. You have already alluded to the array of talent on that Committee, Mr. Winterton; no fewer than six PhDs served on the Committee. The more modest engineers among their number have not revealed themselves, but I believe that the Committee includes at least three chartered engineers. It is the strongest and longest array of talent in the scientific and engineering field ever assembled in a Committee and, as one might expect, they produced a thorough, exciting, but depressing, report.

I speak as an engineer, but that is not the main thrust of my contribution. I have been through the fire; I know what it is like to get innovation going and to try to recruit talented people to fulfil the requirements of an organisation in meeting customers' needs and working at the cutting edge to survive in the harsh, real world. I know the frustration felt when competitors in other countries have much more support, because those countries recognise how important a company's success is to the economy and to the well being of their fellow citizens. That is why I am pleased to have an opportunity to make a small contribution to this debate.

I shall pick out three recommendations from three and a half pages of recommendations and conclusions. I cannot remember a Select Committee report with so much to say on the subject, all of which is extremely worthy and relevant. I shall refer to recommendations (d), (x) and (ii) in the conclusion and say a few words about them.

First, recommendation (d) in paragraph 17 is about the fall in expenditure on research and development. The hon. Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford (Mr. Beard) rightly referred to the importance of paragraphs 16 and 35, which say it all about the dire straits in which our manufacturing industry finds itself. The reasons are to a large extent dependent on the decline in investment in research and development.

It is worth putting on record the sorry tale of that decline as a percentage of our gross domestic product. In 1988, Germany, the United States and Japan spent about 2.7 per cent. of their GDP on research and development. Even in 1988, we were trailing with investment at 2.1 per cent. of GDP. Less than 10 years later, in 1997, investment in Germany, America and Japan had fallen—perhaps they are more efficient—to between 2.4 per cent. and 2.7 per cent. of GDP. In this country, which had been falling behind its main competitors since the 1970s, as the hon. Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford said, the sorry tale continued. By 1997, we were investing 1.8 per cent. of GDP, instead of 2.1 per cent. I stress those figures because they reveal a sorry tale of lack of action by the engines of our economy—state, public and private—and we need some action.

[Mr. David Chidgey]

I accept that the Government have recognised the problem and are making efforts to tackle it, as other hon. Members have said. However, complacency is the disease at the heart of this problem. As the hon. Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford said, it is not enough to quote only one year's figures. We have been facing this problem since the early post-war years. For some years after the second world war, repairing the damage that global conflict had done to our country and others kept our economy afloat. As soon as that was done and we had to compete in the real world for projects and exports, our investment in research and development started to slow down when it should have been speeding up.

I recognise that the Government are aware of the problem and have made some effort to tackle it, but it is not enough to assume that one year's figures represent a new golden dawn. I suggest that we are merely treading water—if we are lucky. I want the Government to understand just how deep the problem is and how much needs to be done to make Britain more competitive and innovative so that we can survive as a major player and benefit our communities and citizens in the years ahead.

Therefore, I turn to paragraph (x) of the conclusions. Again, it is worth reflecting on the points raised by Committee members. In particular, they noted that > Government policy should be focused upon . . . a strong public sector research and education base, at all levels, to provide industry with leading-edge research and the highly trained staff "which is the life-blood of technology-based industry".

They go on to say that the > Government must provide an economic and fiscal environment that supports those who innovate.

I am old enough and ugly enough and was in industry enough years to remember when Monty Finniston produced his report in the 1970s. He had previously been the chief executive of the steel industry. I was much younger then and full of ambition to succeed in my industry, but that is another story. However, I well remember that the Finniston report promised a new golden age for the innovators—engineers, technicians and, in particular, chartered engineers. Whatever happened to the Finniston report? I believe—I can say this in the House, if not outside—that the chief executive of GEC was so worried about having to pay his 20,000 chartered engineers a wage that would keep them attracted to their industry and which would attract the best brains to it, that he somehow managed to persuade the powers that be that Mr. Finniston's report should be discarded. Perhaps that is one reason why we find it so difficult to attract high-quality people from pure science into applied science. The rewards in applied science are still nothing like comparable with those in pure science or with those that people can receive in other countries if they happen to be sufficiently articulate in different languages. It is clear that we must still establish an atmosphere, ambience and environment in which being an engineer is a success in itself and a successful career path.

I recently had the interesting experience of being at a meeting with an eminent person in the engineering world who proudly said that engineers were successful, because they sat on the board of every company in the top 100 blue chip companies. I asked him, "Well, what as?" That is my point: they were all there in a management capacity; not one was there as an engineer in his own right. That perfectly demonstrates the fact that people still see engineering as a platform from which to launch a more attractive, better paid and perhaps more respected career.

One hon. Member—I am not sure whom—referred to investment in industry and blamed the City for not investing in our industry and innovation. That may be true; perhaps we could expect more from the City. However, we must understand that it has never invested in industry. A short trip through history will show us that the City was investing in commerce and trade when it was established and eminent on the world stage back in the 17th century. It was funding ships to go off to the east and west to bring back produce that we could trade for profit. The City had nothing to do with investing in industry—it never even noticed the industrial revolution. The organisation was set up to invest in trade and commerce, which has always been its role.

If we want the City to be something else, that is fine. Perhaps the Government and Parliament have a role there. However, let us understand and accept the City for what it is. We must not use the fact that it is not more than that as a convenient excuse for the failure by the broader institutions of this country to recognise the need to invest in innovation and research.

Paragraph (ii) of the Select Committee's recommendations says:

> The Government must recognise the need to increase the quality and levels of competence of science, engineering and technology graduates.

The Committee notes that the number of personnel employed in research and development fell by 23 per cent. between 1986 and 1996. It also notes that the number of technicians, laboratory assistants and draughtsmen has fallen by even more—30 per cent. The hon. Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford said that poor marketing was part of our problem. However, he also made a point about this country's lack of recognition for the dignity of applied knowledge. The two go hand in hand.

The contribution about the Massachusetts Institute of Technology was interesting. It has always recognised that applied science and pure science are equally important. The role of the scientific professions must be to contribute to the creation of wealth and the economy of a country for the benefit of its citizens as a whole. That is what we do. This is not about some esoteric exercise, but about improving people's lives. If we fail to realise that applied sciences have a vital role and are as important as our pure sciences, we will never achieve that aim. We have lost sight of that in recent decades.

The fall in the number of trained and qualified people working in research and development and in innovation at the cutting edge of industry is perhaps the most serious problem that we face. We cannot solve it simply by adding 10 per cent. to the average wage of a technician, engineer or scientist, or by increasing particular universities' budgets for research and development. The problem goes far deeper than that.

I was fortunate to have the opportunity late last year to attend a conference in Washington, where research fellows from the Hudson institute presented a paper on research into employment potential in this century. The paper, entitled "20:20 Vision", clearly demonstrated the endemic problem in the industrialised western world of not producing sufficient numerate and literate people to drive our economies at the levels expected by our citizens to maintain our current rate of progress. If we do not revise the way in which we fund and produce not just educated, but trained and qualified people, with sufficient skills to drive our cutting-edge technology in our high-tech, high-skilled, knowledge-based economies, our economies will fail. As I said, it is not a question of a little more here and there: we need a fundamental review of how best to invest in people to acquire the skills that our economies need.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Dr. Jones) mentioned the pressures experienced in America in trying to recruit people on the green card system. In Germany—not just in Russia—they are issuing tens of thousands of visas to IT-literate nationals from the Indian sub-continent, which was unheard of 10 years ago in that part of Europe. That shows how serious the problem is. My worry is that if we start to suck in the skills and knowledge of developing countries for the benefit of our own economies, what does it do to them—to the rest of the world, falling off the edge of technological development? In this country, we should recognise the problem and take the lead in producing people with the requisite numeracy, literacy and IT skills to drive our economies.

I congratulate the Government on encouraging local schools to bid to become centres of excellence in various areas. That is exciting as well as encouraging. It is a means of trying to make young people want to study mathematics and science. The Wyvern community school in my constituency of Eastleigh has done just that and won a competition to become a centre of technological excellence. The local aerospace industry—well represented in Hampshire, which is so defence-dependent—is coming in to provide matching funding. That is good, but it is not enough. It is exciting and enthusiastic, but does not deal with the underlying problem of producing people with the requisite talents and enthusing and encouraging them to stay in industry to produce the economic benefits that our citizens expect.

I am glad that the Government seem to be recognising the problem, but I am worried that they might become complacent. I finish by stressing that time is running out.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I call Mr. Richard Page.

4.32 pm

Mr. Richard Page (South-West Hertfordshire): We have all attended debates in the Chamber, at which hon. Members stand up and say how delighted they are to take part. On this occasion, those sentiments are genuine. All too often, a Select Committee labours and slaves over a report, which then gathers dust on some forgotten shelf. That is not true today, and I am absolutely delighted that we are debating the report.

I am wounded, Mr. Deputy Speaker, when you introduce so many doctors, engineers and other experts, but just read out my name.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. From the Chair, may I apologise to the hon. Gentleman? I had intended to introduce him as a business man, so I hope that that will help and suffice. I am aware, of course, of his immense interest in science and research, as well as in business.

Mr. Page: I am now only slightly wounded. My initial training was as a mechanical engineer, so I know a little about the subject. I did my training in the real world rather than in the ivory towers of academia, but I leave that to one side. I have had a long-standing interest in the fortunes of engineering, which dates back to long before I came to the House, and I maintained that interest as a Back Bencher. I continued with it for the short time that I spent as a Minister at the Department of Trade and Industry, before I was given the opportunity to spend a little more time with my family. I still maintain that interest in my more recent role. I am delighted that we have the chance to debate the subject today. My comments will therefore be made with conviction rather than as a result of dogma, although several hon. Members will doubtless feel that my comments are indivisible between the two.

The Science and Technology Committee report makes about 39 conclusions. The Committee will be delighted to know that I intend to speak about only three or four of them. We all understand the long-term factors that are at work in determining the economic record and future prospects of engineering and manufacturing companies. The Government have little direct control in the matter. I echo the point made by the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey); those factors run through our education system and the training of engineers, information technology specialists and specialists in the many physical sciences—and those who are often forgotten: the laboratory assistants, draughtsmen and technicians who play a vital supporting role. Also important is the funding of the nation's research and design and development, a stage through which all products must go before they can be marketed, and business men's requirements to make the products available and saleable.

One reason why the United Kingdom is less successful in supporting innovation in engineering, manufacturing and physical sciences is that, as the hon. Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford (Mr. Beard) said, the dignity of applied knowledge is more important in countries such as Germany, Japan and the United States. They do not have that hang-up and seem to avoid our apparent preference for pure science and the humanities in the education system.

I was profoundly depressed to read in the report that it is less acceptable in the UK to follow a career in emerging technology-based companies or start-ups, and that only 7 per cent. of UK graduates, compared with 68 per cent. in the United States, consider starting their own business. That adverse culture, which is against engineering and manufacturing, still exists deep within the education system. That is why the report, although valuable, is fundamentally depressing. I am reminded of the apocryphal story of the schoolteacher who took her charges to a factory but who, on the bus back to school, told them, "That is where you will end up if you do not pass your exams." The report seems almost to underline that attitude to engineering industry.

That attitude must be changed. The Government's responsibility is not only to secure the training of the work force in high-quality skills, as the Royal Academy of Engineering has pointed out; they must also promote a change in entrenched attitudes. How else can we secure the supply of those technically educated and trained people whose job will be to drive innovation forward in companies and higher education? It is possible to do that.

The Engineering Employers Federation report on engineering general national vocational qualifications published last month showed that young people between the ages of 14 and 16 can be attracted to engineering. Almost half of those taking engineering GNVQs were considering engineering as a career. I am delighted that the girls were particularly interested in product design and development, two areas in which industrial companies have suffered over the years. Two thirds of participants said that they would be prepared to recommend it to their siblings as a career path. I shall not pretend that there is not more work to be done on that and other schemes, because parents and quite a few teachers have still to be persuaded of its full benefits. Some schools surveyed by the Engineering Employers Federation clearly perform better than others and a high proportion of those students—about half—who stay on in education after 16 go on to take A-levels rather than completing the full engineering GNVQ. The important point is that the attitude of those who have taken it has changed and they were more positive about engineering than they had been before.

As I mentioned earlier, the report contains about 39 recommendations and conclusions. However, one point that was not fully considered, but which has been mentioned in the debate, is the fundamental difference between a marketplace requirement that pulls on focused research and general research that pushes through to the marketplace. One has an assured client, a home to go to and someone to pay for it, whereas the other has a more problematic future. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Rayleigh (Dr. Clark) is not in the Chamber because he talked about missing the opportunity to invent Dynotape. We all know that the microwave oven took a few years to follow on from the original discovery of microwaves.

In Japan, there are small groups of people—I believe that one group is called "the ghosts"—who sit down and try to imagine what people would like. When they have worked out what they think people want, they go into a certain area. That drives innovation. I believe that the Sony Walkman was the result of such consideration. That is one of my three pet concerns: the Sony Walkman, jogging and mobile phones. The Sony Walkman will be responsible for more deafness among youngsters than ever before; jogging will lead to people requiring more hip replacements; and the mobile phone is an unknown concern for the future. We have a report on mobile phones before us today, and I believe that legislation could provide an innovative push in that area. Only yesterday, Professor Ted Litovitz, from the Catholic University of America, was in the House. Using a research team, he discovered that the electromagnetic field generated by mobile phones induces biological changes in cells. He was unsure whether it is dangerous but it certainly produced dramatic changes in chick embryos. He discovered that if one could introduce into the phone a small random field, the biochemical response would be removed. In such a case, legislation could be introduced, which would drive the industry.

I want to mention two or three issues raised in the report and to comment and support the remarks made on technology clusters. That is the only way in which we can achieve the various critical masses that are needed to drive forward innovation. Several hon. Members have spoken about their away-day to Boston. About a year ago, I had an away-day to Boston, and I was singularly impressed with the way in which people there encourage innovation. They acknowledged—something that we do not do here—that if someone has an ability in a particular aspect of biotechnology or engineering, that person is unlikely to be an expert on property, running a company, finance and all tax matters. But that is what we require of people when they start a business. People who come up with ideas have to run around, get a lease or buy a property, raise finance and employ people. Young people in particular do not have the expertise.

In Boston, the city elders, including those on the city council and from academia and business, clubbed together and bought three or four research laboratories which were situated back to back. A manager was put in charge. A university professor who spotted someone with a good research idea would say, "Come with us and start your own business." A business manager and someone to run the centre were employed for a percentage of the shares, which was also the basis for raising finance. The young lad or girl could get their research idea up and running quickly without experiencing the learning curve of how to run a business. They were free to get on with developing their research. The record for taking someone from the university to a laboratory was 48 hours. The city elders have not had failure. Indeed, they have had considerable success, with every company spilling on to the marketplace and creating thousands of jobs. The report found a great deal of empirical evidence to support the idea that clusters are effective in fostering innovation, but there is a lack of knowledge on how clusters function.

I know that the Government have established a ministerial group on the subject. I hope that the Minister will expand on its thinking. The issue was raised during the synchrotron debate. By siting the synchrotron in Oxfordshire, Lord Sainsbury gave £50 million for the science base in the north-west. What was the reason for that? Was it a political consolation prize or was there a specific and understood motive? Do the Government intend to determine the location of scientific clusters from the centre? Are they looking for where organic growth in certain disciplines occurs? Will their decisions and policies relate to those clusters, however small? If the Government are to establish scientific clusters, they must have an overall strategy. It is not sufficient to toss a few pounds here, there and everywhere as compensation.

The Committee envisaged a second role for the Govt. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Dr. Jones) mentioned the mere £22 billion that is being put into the engineering pot. My hon. Friend the Member for Esher and Walton (Mr. Taylor) came up with the auction idea when he was a Minister. I think that he regrets that he was unable to get a slice of the action on that brilliant and highly successful arrangement. The Committee thought that the Government should produce an economic and fiscal environment to support those who innovate. The hon. Member for Selly Oak explained her method to fund that, but the Government are failing to fulfil that role. A low-tax economy rewards entrepreneurs and investors who take risks and achieve success. I do not expect universal agreement about this in the Chamber, but we must bear in mind that the Government have increased taxation on companies by a substantial amount. We are given a figure of £30 billion, but I do not know how accurate that is. Business must cope with an extra £10 billion in new regulatory costs. I am going to make only one point—it is a completely different point of view. The Committee recommends giving research and development tax credits to large companies as well as small. I can see some merit in that, but an alternative solution to the lack of investment is to create a low-regulation, low-tax economy, which leaves companies free to invest.

The report does not say how the Government will address the challenges in the future. The relative decline in our spending on research has been mentioned by hon. Members. Hon. Members have mentioned the contraction in the numbers and, perhaps more importantly, in the quality of those conducting programmes of research and innovation. The disparity between the reward for careers in management compared to those in the City and other areas has also been mentioned. I know a group of young lads and one girl who studied engineering at Imperial college. They worked exceedingly hard and achieved good degrees. However, two years after attaining their degrees, only one is still working in engineering. The rest have been siphoned off into the City and other careers with much more profitable returns. One has gone to the United States and has caused immense jealousy among his former friends and colleagues because his new company has valued him at £40 million. For a lad of 28, that is not bad going. As others have said, there is disparity in salaries.

I hope that the Minister will comment on how she thinks we can try to change that culture, encourage people into engineering and the physical sciences, and encourage companies to give better rewards for those who take that route.

The Government's record since taking office has not been as satisfactory as some have claimed. The Department of Trade and Industry's own research and development scoreboard for 1998-99 shows that the overall increase in research and development, specifically in engineering and telecommunications, can be accounted for by spending by large companies. We want to see those companies grow. Most companies were and are spending less than the average. The big international companies among the 561 on the 1999 list increased their research and development spending by 12 per cent. That is double the rate of the domestic companies, which are also starting from a lower base.

In engineering, the commitment to fund research and development was lower than that of companies in other industrial sectors. Indeed, when compared with the world average figure, I would go further than the Select Committee's description of "particularly disappointing" and say that in engineering, R and D is largely D. We in this country cannot sit and watch the trend continue.

As I said at the start, I wanted to touch on only three or four points. The report is immensely valuable and the Committee is to be congratulated. I hope that, whatever else it might do, this report will help to drive forward innovation in our engineering and physical science base.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before I call the Minister, it is appropriate to tell hon. Members that the Chairman of the Select Committee on Science and Technology has had to leave in order to Chair the Finance Bill Standing Committee. That is the why he could not stay until the end of the debate.

The Minister for Small Business and E-Commerce (Ms Patricia Hewitt): I feel rather inadequate in responding to this debate as a mere arts graduate who does not even have a PhD. I must apologise to hon. Members for that omission. I hope that I shall at least be able to borrow some reflected glory, as I am the constituency Member of Parliament for the new national space science centre, which will build on the absolutely outstanding work of the University of Leicester's space science department and spread that into business and education.

The hon. Member for Rayleigh (Dr. Clark) explained that he would not be able to stay in Westminster Hall to hear the winding-up speeches and courteously informed me of that before the debate. I pay tribute to him for his work as Chairman of the Science and Technology Committee and for the experience that he has brought to that post as a scientist. I should like also to compliment all members of the Committee on their outstanding, long and hard work in producing an excellent report.

The debate is timely, as this week sees Celebration of Innovation 2000, a week-long series of national and regional events around the United Kingdom. The event celebrates and showcases innovation in all its different forms, and brings together more than 25,000 innovators, entrepreneurs, academics, scientists and engineers. It builds on what used to be only a single event on a single day. This debate is highly appropriate, taking place in the same week as an excellent series of events organised by the Department of Trade and Industry innovation unit.

In his excellent opening speech, the hon. Member for Rayleigh made the important point that a stable economic base must underpin science, research, development and the whole chain of innovation. It is the absence of economic stability and—to use a novel phrase—the depressing cycle of boom and bust that has inhibited investment in Britain. That instability is one of the main reasons for the decline in civil research and development expenditure, to which the hon. Member for Rayleigh and other hon. Members have rightly referred and to which the Committee devotes much attention in its report.

Of course, our research and development expenditure is nowhere near as high as that of a number of our international competitor countries. As several hon. Members have noted, our current gross expenditure on research and development is merely the fifth highest among countries in the Group of Seven. As I think the hon. Member for Rayleigh acknowledged, the most recent figures, which have been released since the publication of the report, indicate an arrest in that decline. Between 1997 and 1998, total research and development expenditure increased in real terms by 2 per cent. to some £15.5 billion. In 1998, total expenditure on research and development in the United Kingdom increased as a percentage of gross domestic product for the first time since 1993, to £10.2 billion.

As hon. Members have acknowledged, the United Kingdom's pharmaceuticals and aerospace sectors are world leaders in their field and continue to build on the large-scale investments that they have made in research and development. Civil expenditure on business enterprise research and development increased in real terms in 1998.

Our pointing out those facts, as we did in our response to the Select Committee's report, does not mean that we are complacent or that we think that one swallow will make a summer. However, the facts suggest that we might have bottomed out and that we might be turning a corner. Our intention in government is to do what is necessary to ensure that those encouraging figures are not simply a blip in a long story of continuing decline, but represent a turning point in research and development investment. That is one of the crucial issues that we are considering in the spending review 2000, especially through the cross-cutting review on science and innovation, to which we will return in the science White Paper.

Much of the increase in R and D is funded from abroad. That demonstrates the growing confidence of foreign-owned firms in our science and engineering base. The base is one of the many elements that attract them to this country and continue to make the UK the No. 1 destination, by a considerable margin, for direct foreign investment in the European Union.

There are also exciting examples to be drawn from UK business. I had the opportunity on Tuesday morning of spending several hours at BT's technology park—Adastral park—of which I am sure many hon. Members are aware. Engineers, physical scientists and scientists and innovators from many other disciplines are coming together, not simply to create new leading-edge scientific applications but, crucially, to start exploiting BT's research over many decades. The company has discovered that research has resulted in a stockpile—a gold mine—of patents that have never been commercially exploited. It invented and patented wonderful processes, and put them away because they were not directly relevant to the business. It was extremely encouraging to see at Adastral park a marriage of scientific research and entrepreneurship. That is leading to a spin-off of companies from the old patents, which are being nurtured at BT's new incubator at the park.

We must ensure that the increase in R and D expenditure that has begun is continued and built on. My hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford (Mr. Beard) rightly notes, as does the Committee's report, that innovation is not a one-off event but a chain of activities. As the Government, we must help—and we are doing so—to strengthen every link in that chain of innovation. Our commitment to the first link in the chain is demonstrated by the increase in spending on the science and engineering base of £1 billion over the three years from 1999-2000 to 2001-02, as my hon. Friend acknowledged.

We have already achieved 47 of the 75 commitments that we made in the competitiveness White Paper. Achievements include not only the increase in the science budget, but the creation of the joint infrastructure fund. That is part of an exciting new partnership between the Wellcome Trust and the Higher Education Funding Council for England, which is beginning to reverse the chronic and long-standing under-investment in research infrastructure. We were able to announce last month support worth almost £130 million for 27 projects at 21 universities across the country. That brought the total spend to date to £600 million.

We introduced the R and D tax credit for small and medium-sized enterprises in this year's Budget. I note the Committee's view that it should be extended to larger companies, which I have heard echoed by industrialists in such companies. The Government will of course consider the issue. As hon. Members will surely realise, the difficulty is that one would run the risk of substantial deadweight costs if one were to extend the credit to very large companies. Tax allowances would be given for R and D investment that would have occurred anyway. There is a real issue for small companies that are part of larger conglomerates, particularly when the re[illegible] of the group is based overseas.

For that reason, small United Kingdom companies may find themselves excluded from the benefits of the tax credit and other programmes. We certainly need to consider that. The Department has also increased the budget for helping businesses to use new technology and to encourage innovation. We have strengthened the links between universities and businesses, including the crucial promotion of business incubators in universities.

The programmes have shown some startling successes. Even though we must be realistic about the challenges that we face, it is important that we do not talk down the successes that are already being achieved. For instance—I readily acknowledge that this was under the previous Government—Bookham Technology Ltd. obtained a smart grant from the DTI to help it to exploit an invention in optical networks. The founder and president of that company, Dr. Andrew Rickman, said that Bookham Technology could not have started without it. It started as a one-man company, consisting of Andrew Rickman, but is now a business with a market capitalisation of nearly £4 billion. I wonder whether a case might be made for taking just a tiny, tiny slice of equity in companies that are awarded such grants—although that, of course, is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor.

The hon. Member for Rayleigh—other hon. Members echoed the point—suggested that we need to simplify and streamline the large number of programmes that support links between the science base and industry. I have a great deal of sympathy with that view. We know that it is often difficult for the entrepreneur or the person running a small business to know where to go for help, or where to find the innovative science or academic expert needed to transform the business. The recently created small business service has a remit to consider how to simplify and streamline general Government support for small businesses. The issue of making our support for innovation even more effective, particularly as it is used by small businesses, will be dealt with in the science White Paper.

We have done and are doing more, particularly in electronic commerce and in support for small businesses. We have been working—I believe successfully—with small businesses to accelerate the rapid take-up of new information and communication technologies. We are helping to develop the UK venture capital industry; indeed, several hon. Members referred to the importance of business angels and the venture capital sector in supporting entrepreneurship. Through public investment in the enterprise fund, we are creating not only the high technology venture capital fund, but regional venture capital funds, which will help to close the equity gap faced by too many of our businesses.

We have been reviewing and reforming the laws on insolvency and bankruptcy, to reassess our approach to risk, and to ensure that honest, but perhaps unfortunate, entrepreneurs are not deterred from going back into business. The hon. Member for Rayleigh made the important point that, in reforming the insolvency laws to promote honest entrepreneurship and risk taking, we must not damage the interests of creditors, who may themselves be entrepreneurs and small businesses. He is absolutely right. We are ensuring that, in our arrangements to distinguish between honest bankrupts—the vast majority—and the minority of bankrupts who have indulged in fraudulent or dishonest practices, we not only protect creditors, but strengthen arrangements for them and implement more effective schemes for voluntary repayment. The small business service is already making strides towards delivering our goal of providing world-class business support services to small businesses all around the country.

My hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough, South and Cleveland, East (Dr. Kumar) spoke with a wealth of knowledge about science and innovation in the north-east, much of it gained from his experience before he entered the House. One phrase that I thought was hugely significant was his reference to what some people call "the old economy". The two phrases "the new economy" and "the old economy" have created a misleading impression of what is going on as we move into the knowledge-driven economy of the future. They all too often imply that the sectors of the old economy, particularly those of traditional manufacturing, are inevitably destined for decline and death. That is wrong and shows a complete misunderstanding of the technological revolution that is taking place.

The new technologies, including information and communication technology, are transforming production processes and products in every sector, including the most long-established manufacturing sectors. Part of our mission is to ensure that small and medium-sized businesses in every part of the economy, but particularly in the manufacturing sector, exploit the new technologies to the full so that we have a high-technology manufacturing base which will help to raise standards of living and quality of life, and to generate new and better jobs. He referred also to the importance of venture capital funding and I entirely agree on the need to ensure that equity funding is available right around the country, and not simply in the south-east.

My hon. Friend the Member for East Carmarthen and Dinefwr (Mr. Williams) rightly referred to the wonderful science "car boot sales" that have been initiated by the Royal Society of Chemistry. They are clearly an innovative way of spreading the spirit of innovation into small companies. We know from evaluation that they have been extremely successful in that aim. I entirely agree with my hon. Friend about the need to balance our support for pure research in the universities with our support for knowledge transfer and the exploitation of that research in the marketplace.

Our universities should be both stimulators and facilitators of knowledge transfer to business and to society more broadly. We want universities to adopt a diversity of missions so that they excel in their chosen areas of strength, whether pure research or knowledge transfer. We are trying to encourage that application of science and knowledge through new initiatives such as university challenge, the science enterprise challenge and the higher education reach-out into business and the community fund, all of which the Committee welcomed.

We have also increased funding for some long-established programmes, including the teaching company scheme programme, and are building on that in the new Faraday partnerships. My hon. Friend the Member for East Carmarthen and Dinefwr was a little too dismissive of the investment that we are making in the Faraday partnerships. Four pilot centres are up and running. We have just issued the call for the next four, but we will not stop there. The intention is to roll out new Faraday partnership centres at a rate of four a year.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Dr. Jones) rightly referred to the importance of people. Innovation is fundamentally about people at every point in the value chain. She and the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey) stressed the need to attract young men and women into science and engineering at university level and then into careers in those fields. Overall, the number of people graduating with science, engineering and technology qualifications has increased. More people than ever before are graduating in those disciplines. However, although the absolute number is increasing, those people represent a declining proportion of the growing number of students.

There are some mismatches between supply and demand. Employers are reporting shortages at graduate and postgraduate level in specialised forms of chemistry and electronic engineering, for example. Business needs graduates with broader business expertise as well as excellent scientific and engineering skills. That is one reason why we have encouraged universities and given them real financial incentives to include business skills and entrepreneurial education in the curriculum for science and engineering undergraduates.

There is a widespread shortage of people with intermediate qualifications, particularly in engineering and information technology. We have responded by creating the new foundation degrees, which broaden the higher education portfolio. They will provide specialist technical knowledge, employability skills and the broad understanding needed in the new economy. That will help to increase our national competitiveness by tackling the skills deficit at the intermediate level.

[Ms Patricia Hewitt]

We are acting on the important issue of building high-technology science-based industrial clusters, which my hon. Friend the Member for Selly Oak and the hon. Member for South-West Hertfordshire (Mr. Page) raised. As we say in our response to the Committee's report, the Government have a clear role in providing the environment in which new and existing clusters can develop and grow. Lord Sainsbury is developing that work through the clusters policy steering group. It will make recommendations for new policy initiatives to the Cabinet, which held an extremely important seminar on clusters with Professor Michael Porter from Harvard university some months ago, because they are a crucial ingredient in a modern industrial policy. The group has a broad membership and is engaging in widespread consultation. It will also draw on a full mapping study of the clusters that exist or are emerging.

Regional development agencies will be the key delivery mechanism of progress. Every RDA's economic strategy is to begin to identify the clusters on which to build, and which they need to strengthen by attracting new inward investment. In the Budget, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor allocated £50 million of additional funding to help RDAs to promote clusters and business incubation.

My hon. Friend the Member for Selly Oak made an important point about environmental technologies and ensuring that we secure competitive advantage for United Kingdom businesses in developing such technologies, the production processes and the products which will become increasingly important in tackling enormous problems such as climate change. We are already undertaking a considerable amount of work.

My hon. Friend referred to the motor manufacturing sector. Through the cleaner vehicles task force, we have worked with the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions and the motor industry to pull through more rapid innovation in the development of less polluting and non-polluting vehicles that will help to meet the rapidly growing demand for better mobility. We have also introduced the climate change levy on a revenue-neutral, base to give better environmental signals to business and encourage the innovation that she described.

I am all too conscious that I have not been able to respond to every point raised during this extremely interesting, informative and well informed debate. We are living at a time of fundamental discontinuity and witnessing an absolute revolution in technology and the economic system. Our country led the world into the first industrial revolution, and we are determined to ensure that it becomes one of the winners and leaders in the new knowledge-driven economy of the 21st century.

I am very grateful to all the hon. Members who helped to compile the Committee's excellent report. I assure them that we will draw on their recommendations when we finalise our science White Paper, and then move forward to deliver on its vision of the United Kingdom as a world-beater in the knowledge-driven economy.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This has been a very good debate on a most important Select Committee report. Such debates are one purpose of sittings in Westminster Hall.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty minutes past Five o'clock.

Written Answers to Questions

Tuesday 2 May 2000

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Marriage Counsellors

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many marriage counsellors funded (a) partly and (b) wholly by the Government, there were in the UK in (i) 1970, (ii) 1980 and (iii) 1999; and what was the cost. [120660]

Jane Kennedy: In the financial year 1999–2000 the Lord Chancellor's Department spent £3.2 million on marriage and relationship support. Grant-in-aid is given to the central bodies of the main marriage support and research organisations towards expenses incurred in the development of training and support to local services, including the selection, training and supervision of counsellors, and administrative costs.

In line with Sir Graham Hart's recommendations in his report on Marriage Support Funding (November 1999), the allocation is being increased to £4 million in 2001–01; £4.5 million in 2002–02; and £5 million in 2002–03. Figures for 1970 and 1980 are not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

EU Withdrawal

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Solicitor-General, pursuant to his oral answer of 13 April 2000, Official Report, column 498, what was the basis of his statement concerning the policy of the organisation Conservatives Against a Federal Europe toward withdrawal from the EU. [119836]

The Solicitor-General: I understand that until recently the CAFÉ website stated that if certain ends were not achieved by negotiations, quite unrealistic in my opinion, the UK must withdraw from the EU.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Sellafield

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the extent to which the site ion exchange extraction and the enhanced altinide removal waste filtration plants servicing the thermal oxide reprocessing plant facility at Sellafield have met their planned operational functions. [119134]

Mr. Meacher: The Environment Agency monitors and assesses the performance of the various effluent treatment plant on the Sellafield site including the site ion exchange extraction plant (SIXEP) and the enhanced actinide removal plant (EARP).

During 1998 the Environment Agency report concluded that the Enhanced Actinide Removal Plant (EARP) performed satisfactorily in the removal of plutonium and other actinides from liquid effluent streams. In addition, the report considered that the plant has been reasonably effective for the removal of strontium-90 (Sr-90) and caesium-137 (Cs-137). The Agency considers there is scope for optimising the performance of EARP in line with the best practicable means. The Agency will continue to press for improvements in the effectiveness of EARP in reducing radionuclide discharges.

The Agency also judges that the Site Ion Exchange Plant (SIXEP) has continued to operate satisfactorily in 1998 and has achieved high efficiencies for the removal of both Sr-90 and Cs-137 from the fuel storage pond effluents. The Agency notes that BNFL has made progress in the research and development programme for the optimisation of SIXEP.

Electrical Goods

Mr. Gummer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to phase out stand-by systems on electrical goods. [119288]

Mr. Meacher: The approach which the Government have followed, with other EU countries, is not to prevent the inclusion of stand-by systems in such products. In future, more equipment will communicate automatically with other equipment, users and service providers, and this will involve stand-by systems. Therefore, our approach is to ensure that these features incorporate good energy efficiency technology and do not encourage waste. We have been supporting EU initiatives in this field, which recently led to an agreement with manufacturers to reduce stand-by power consumption of new televisions and video cassette recorders. Further initiatives are in hand to reduce stand-by energy consumption in the fast growing areas of "set-up boxes" and power supply packs.

Birth Certificates

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions for what purposes his Department requires a birth certificate to be furnished by (a) employees, (b) contractors, (c) those applying for employment and contracts and (d) other persons. [120320]

Ms Beverley Hughes: A birth certificate or similar documentary evidence may be required for one or more of the following reasons:

proof of identity
proof of eligibility under the civil service nationality rules
proof of age.

In addition to the purposes listed, the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency requires applicants for their first photocard driving licences to produce either a birth certificate or a passport in support of their application.

Deprivation (Funding)

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what funding sources are available to small pockets of deprivation outside the inner cities. [120124]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Single Regeneration Budget (SRB) is the main source of government funding for tackling the most deprived areas in England, regardless of whether or not they are in inner-city areas, amounting to some £679 million in 1999–2000. However, 20 per cent. of the SRB resources goes to significant pockets of deprivation in areas which are not in the most deprived areas, such as rural areas, market towns, the former coalfield areas and coastal towns.

In addition, substantial amounts of European Structural Funds will be available for the period 2000–06 amounting to £1,867 million for Objective 1 areas and £2,370 million for Objective 2 areas. A wide range of Government funding is also available, both as match funding and more generally, and this is set out in the DTI booklet, "Match Funding for European Structural Funds", published in March 2000.

Waste Management

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the Government's strategy for waste management. [120089]

Mr. Meacher: The Government published "A Way With Waste", the draft waste strategy for England and Wales, in June 1999. The draft strategy described the need for substantial changes in the way we manage our waste, and the range of actions needed to deliver that change. We will publish the final version shortly.

Seat Belts

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what action he is taking to encourage the fitting of seat belts on minibuses and coaches; and if he will make a statement. [120261]

Mr. Hill: Since 1998, all minibuses and coaches used to carry groups of three or more children on organised trips, including home to school transport, have been required to have seat belts fitted. The DETR is currently conducting a public consultation exercise on draft regulations which will require seat belts to be fitted to all new minibuses, coaches and buses which do not carry standing passengers. I understand that many minibus and coach manufacturers are already fitting seat belts as standard equipment to their new vehicles.

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is the Government's policy on the introduction of compulsory wearing of seat belts on minibuses and coaches transporting children; and if he will make a statement. [120262]

Mr. Hill: All minibuses and coaches carrying children on organised trips must provide a forward facing seat and a lap belt as a minimum. On minibuses with an unladen weight of 2,540 kgs or less, the law already requires that seat belts be worn where fitted.

The Government currently have no plans to introduce compulsory seat belt wearing in minibuses above 2,540 kgs unladen weight and in coaches transporting children. The Government recognise the attractions of such a step but problems arise over enforcement and the legal liability of a driver in respect of children under 14. Moreover, the police would not be able easily to enforce seat belt wearing regulations in such large vehicles. Nevertheless, we are keeping this matter under review.

Road Maintenance

Mr. Moore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will publish the results from each local highway authority that were used in the 1998 National Road Maintenance Condition Survey. [120734]

Mr. Hill: The National Road Maintenance Condition Survey is designed to produce estimates at the national level but not at the individual local authority level. Accordingly information is collected from local highway authorities on the basis that it is for statistical purposes only and will not be published by the DETR in an identifiable form.

Mr. Moore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the results of the 1999 National Road Maintenance Condition Survey will be published. [120733]

Mr. Hill: The Report was published on 26 April (this was the publication date announced in "National Statistics Update" on 29 February). Copies of the Report are available in the House of Commons Library.

Whitley Way, Hampshire

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what representations he has received on the building of Whitley Way in Hampshire; [120271]

(2) what estimate his Department has made of the costs of purchasing land to build Whitley Way in Hampshire. [120270]

Ms Beverley Hughes: As the Whitley Way is proposed as a local distributor road it is for the local planning and highway authorities to decide whether it should be built. This Department has therefore made no estimate of the associated costs. The Department has received a small number of representations about this road.

Traffic-free Areas

Mr. Bill O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what procedures his Department has laid down to be followed when local authorities intend to introduce traffic into pedestrian areas or town centres; and if he will make a statement. [120386]

Mr. Hill: Local authorities have powers under the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984 to regulate traffic on local roads by making traffic regulation orders. These powers can be used to allow traffic into pedestrian areas or town centres. Access can be restricted to certain classes of vehicles and/or times of day. Local authorities are required to follow statutory procedures laid down in "The Local Authorities' Traffic Orders (Procedure)

(England and Wales) Regulations 1996", which include consultation with interested parties and publication of their proposals in a local newspaper. The Department has also published guidance on introducing pedestrian zones in Local Transport Note 1/87 titled "Getting the Right Balance—Guidance on Vehicle Restriction in Pedestrian Zones".

Royal Train

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 19 April 2000, Official Report, columns 489–90W, on the Royal Train, what steps are being taken to increase the non-royal use of the Royal Train. [120615]

Mr. Hill: Under the arrangements establishing the Royal Travel grant-in-aid in 1997, the Royal Household and the Department decided to consider proposals for alternate use of the Train, when it was in the national interest to do so and as part of the ongoing policy of reducing the cost of official Royal travel. Government Departments were duly advised that the Train, when not being used for official Royal travel, was available for use on a reimbursable basis. To date, the FCO is the only Government Department to have used the Train.

Both the Department and the Household have received preliminary inquiries from several organisations about using the Train but none of these has yet put forward any firm proposals.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many times the Royal Train was used by (a) Her Majesty the Queen, (b) the Prince of Wales and (c) other members of the Royal Family in the last 12 months. [120616]

Mr. Hill: In the year ended 31 March 2000, the Royal Train was used (a) eight times by Her Majesty the Queen accompanied by the Duke of Edinburgh, (b) 14 times by the Prince of Wales, and (c) twice by the Duke of Edinburgh and once by the Princess Royal. All these journeys were in support of official Royal engagements.

House Building (Flood Plains)

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is the national planning guidance regarding the building of houses on flood plains; and if he will make a statement. [120219]

Ms Beverley Hughes: My hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning announced on 13 April 2000, Official Report, columns 249–50W, the publication of a consultation draft of a new Planning Policy Guidance Note 25, "Development and flood risk". This sets out proposals for a strengthening of the existing policy, which seeks to avoid inappropriate development in flood plains or development that increases flood risk. It gives specific guidance on the approach to new housing development. It recognises, however, that there will be occasions when other considerations outweigh flooding issues in favour of development proceeding. In such cases, it emphasises the need for development to be made safe through the adoption of appropriate protection or mitigation measures.

Wembley Stadium

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the proposals for improvements to the road and rail links to Wembley Stadium and the costings for such improvements. [120634]

Mr. Hill: The Wembley Task Force is in the process of developing proposals for road and rail improvements to Wembley Stadium, in conjunction with the local authority, rail operators and Wembley National Stadium Ltd.

Regional Development Agencies

Mr. Stevenson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Lloyd) on 17 April 2000, Official Report, column 317W, on regional development agencies, for what reason the West Midlands regional development agency received no increase in funds. [120500]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The West Midlands Development Agency received an increase in funds of £1.0 million between 1999–2000 and 2000–01. Six of the Agency's seven main budgets have increased, by a total of £12.4 million. The seventh, for Land and Property, has decreased by £11.4 million as a result of year-on-year variation in legally-committed expenditure and in income derived from sales.

Pet Cremation

Mr. Todd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the impact on pet cremation services of current and proposed waste incineration and animal waste rules. [120605]

Mr. Hill: Expert consultants reported to my Department on the impact of the proposed waste incineration directive, including for pet crematoria, at the beginning of 1999. The report, "Regulatory and Environmental Impact Assessment of the Proposed Waste Incineration Directive" (Entec UK Ltd.) is in the House Library.

Mr. Todd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what consultation has taken place with those offering pet cremation services on the implementation of the Waste Incineration Directive Common Position 7/2000. [120606]

Mr. Hill: As part of the preparation of their report to my Department on the impact of the proposed waste incineration directive, expert consultants at the end of 1998 consulted two pet crematoria direct, including a site visit, and consulted the UK Private Pet Cemetery and Crematoria Association. A copy of the report, "Regulatory and Environmental Impact Assessment of the Proposed Waste Incineration Directive" by Entec UK Ltd. is in the House Library.

We now expect the proposal to be adopted as a Directive in the autumn, subject to the progress of the final stages of negotiation. The deadline for transposition into UK law will be two years after adoption. The proposal is therefore likely to apply to new plant from autumn 2002. Existing plant will not, however, have to comply until 5 years after adoption, ie autumn 2005.

We are looking at implementation options, which will minimise the burden on pet crematoria while ensuring that there are appropriate environmental safeguards.

Parish Councils

Ms Ward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to change the role and powers of parish councils. [120625]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Parish councils are an essential part of the structure of local democracy. They will continue to play a key role in the governance of many of our towns and villages. As part of the preparation for our forthcoming Rural White Paper we are looking at ways of strengthening the contribution that parish councils can make.

DEFENCE

Prisoners of War

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he will announce his decision on a special gratuity for former Far East prisoners of war or their widows. [120033]

Dr. Moonie: I met with representatives of the Royal British Legion, along with the Prime Minister, on 10 April to discuss this issue. The matter is being given careful consideration; however, no decision has yet been made.

Atomic Weapons Establishment

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of Lockheed Martin's safety record in nuclear work undertaken in the United States; and if he will list the identified shortcomings. [116240]

Mr. Spellar: In the assessment process for the AWE contract, bidders were required to provide information to demonstrate their safety record. AWE ML provided full information on its parent companies including Lockheed Martin. This information was assessed not only by the Department but by the independent regulators, the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate (NII) in the context of AWE's existing safety regime, and by the Environment Agency (EA). The NII confirmed before the contract was signed that it was satisfied. The EA confirmed its satisfaction on 9 March when it issued revised discharge authorisations for the AWE sites.

After the contract was placed on 1 December, there was an incident at the Oak Ridge Y12 facility in Tennessee which resulted in the publicity of a number of alleged shortcomings in Lockheed Martin's safety record in the US. As a result the Secretary of State asked the Chief of Defence Procurement to carry out a further review to ensure that none of the Lockheed Martin nominees to AWE ML was connected with the criticisms made. In addition, the Department consulted with the US Department of Energy concerning Lockheed Martin's safety performance, and both of the UK's regulatory authorities were again consulted about the suitability of Lockheed Martin to act as a shareholder in AWE ML.

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the criticality non-compliances recently reported to his Department for which Lockheed Martin was responsible in the USA which his Department deemed significant. [116243]

Mr. Spellar: Incidents at nuclear facilities in the US are the responsibility of the US regulators and therefore are not routinely reported to the Department. However, as part of the bidding process for the contract to manage and operate AWE, each consortium had to provide information to demonstrate the safety performance of their parent companies, including Lockheed Martin. Furthermore, the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate (NII) routinely review significant safety events even if they take place outside the UK to see if there are any implications for safety at UK nuclear facilities. The Department also took account of the opinions of the US regulators in assessing the review of policies and procedures at the Oak Ridge Y12 plant carried out by Lockheed Martin.

I would like to add that following the incident at the Oak Ridge facility in early December, an amendment was inserted into the new AWE contract by which Lockheed Martin, and its partners in AWE ML, are required to notify MOD of occurrences that might have a bearing on operations at AWE within 48 hours.

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on what date he was informed of Lockheed Martin's safety record at the sites it managed for the Department of Energy in the USA. [116241]

Mr. Spellar: As part of its bid for the new contract to manage and operate AWE, the AWE ML consortium provided the Department with evidence on the safety record of each of its parent companies, including Lockheed Martin. Each bidder was required to demonstrate a proven and successful track record with specific relevant experience in, inter alia, licensed nuclear site operations. Lockheed Martin provided this information to the Department on 1 June 1999.

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to reconsider the decision to award the Aldermaston and Burghfield contract to AWE Management Ltd. [116245]

Mr. Spellar: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, West (Mr. Salter) on 29 March 2000, Official Report, columns 159–60W.

Departmental Property

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what (a) number and (b) percentage of properties in his charge are empty; and what steps are being taken by his Department to reduce the number of such properties. [116917]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 3 April 2000]: At 1 April 1999 there were a total of 13,962 unoccupied properties within the Services married quarters estate in the United Kingdom and Northern Ireland. This represented some 21 per cent. of total stock.

At 1 April 1999 the Defence Housing Executive held a stock of 62,420 married quarters in England, Scotland and Wales, of which 48,852 were occupied and 1,999 were in the course of disposal. Of the balance of 11,569 properties, 2,559 were under offer to Service families and were likely to be occupied within the next two months; 1,035 properties were vacant awaiting future Unit deployments or use as decant accommodation during the refurbishment programmes; 1,931 properties were empty awaiting modernisation and 6,044 were routine empty properties, i.e. a working management margin for some 22,000 family moves each year.

The majority of empty Service quarters are only temporarily so. The large number of Service family moves a year requires a management margin of empty stock ready for incoming occupants. Additionally, an ongoing modernisation programme and Defence reorganisation also demand that a considerable number of properties are empty while work is undertaken and future plans are clarified. Some 2,000 properties were released in 1999 and some 6,500 properties are planned to be released over the next two years.

The majority of the MOD housing stock in England and Wales is owned by Annington Homes. Properties identified as having no long term requirement to the Department are released to that company. Surplus MOD-owned properties are sold through Defence Estates.

In Northern Ireland a further 3,054 Service families quarters were owned by the Ministry of Defence at 1 April 1999 of which 394 were empty.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many properties in the United Kingdom earmarked for Army officers, Naval officers, and RAF officers are empty; how many have been empty for more than six months; what the figures are for Hampshire; and if he will make a statement. [118700]

Dr. Moonie: Service Families Accommodation (SFA) is managed on a tri-Service basis and is made available according to entitlement, i.e. by rank and family size. A breakdown by individual Service is not available. At 31 March 2000 there were 2,288 unoccupied officers' SFA in England, Scotland and Wales. Of these, 1,161 have been empty for more than six months. There were 234 unoccupied officers' SFA in Hampshire at 31 March 2000 of which 96 had been empty in excess of six months.

Overall, 6,500 properties are planned for disposal during the next two years. Most of the MOD housing stock in England and Wales is owned by Annington Homes and underleased by MOD. Properties identified as having no long-term requirement to the Department are released to that company. Surplus MOD owned properties are sold by Defence Estates.

In Northern Ireland 50 officers' quarters were empty at 31 March 2000 of which 12 had been empty for over six months.

Principal Anti-air Missile System

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the cost of the UK's participation in the Principal anti-air missile system. [117848]

Dr. Moonie: This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Defence Procurement Agency. I have asked the Chief Executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Robert Walmsley to Mr. Michael Hancock, dated 2 May 2000:

I am replying to your question to the Secretary of State for Defence about the cost of UK participation in the Principal Anti-Air Missile System (PAAMS). This matter falls to me to answer within my area of responsibility as Chief of Defence Procurement and Chief Executive of the Defence Procurement Agency.

As I said in my letters to you of 15 and 21 December 1999, the total programme cost for the twelve currently planned Type 45 warships (including weapon systems) is approximately £6Bn. This includes approximately £1.2Bn for the development, design and build of the first of class ship and £1Bn for the development and initial production of PAAMS. The balance of £3.8Bn contains funding for additional missile procurement and allows for the incremental acquisition of the combat system.

Troop Strengths

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the (a) trained strength and (b) trained requirement of the UK (i) regular armed forces, (ii) reserve forces and (iii) Territorial Army. [118789]

Mr. Spellar: The latest available figures on a consistent basis across all services are as follows:

(a) UK Regular Forces trained strength and trained requirement as at 1 February 2000:

UK Regular Forces[1] trained strength—186,317

UK Regular Forces[2] trained requirement—194,661

(b) UK Volunteer Reserve Forces strength and post-SDR establishment as at 1 February 2000 (all figures include trained and untrained personnel):

UK Volunteer Reserve Forces[3] current strength (includes Territorial Army strength[4] of 44,387)—50,224

[2] Excludes trained requirement of 2,945 Gurkhas.

[3] Includes volunteer reserve forces only. These comprise the Royal Naval Reserve, the Royal Marine Reserve, the Territorial Army and the Royal Auxiliary Air Force.

[4] Excludes strength of 1,408 non-regular permanent staff.

[5] See note [3].

Defence Evaluation and Research Agency

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what consultation process has been carried out involving staff of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency on its future. [119033]

Mr. Hoon: Following the announcement in 1998 of a Public Private Partnership (PPP) for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (DERA), consultation has been an important and regular feature of the process.

We have consulted directly with staff on a formal and informal basis and also through trade union representatives, and will continue to do so.

The mechanisms for PPP consultation to date have included:

DERA PPP Consultation Documents, published in May 1999 and April 2000, which invited staff, and other stakeholders to comment on the Ministry of Defence's proposals for a PPP structure.

Regular senior management briefings.

Team briefings conducted on a monthly basis by departmental managers.

DERA News, a monthly in-house publication, which regularly updates staff on the progress of the PPP.

DERA website, which again provides regular updates.

Informal departmental briefings.

In addition to direct consultation with staff, Ministers have met on a number of occasions with trade union representatives to discuss the progress of the PPP. Officials have also met with union representatives on a regular basis to discuss their specific issues and concerns.

Following the announcement in the House, 17 April 2000, Official Report, columns 366–67W, we are now engaged in a period of formal consultation on our revised proposals for the PPP. A consultation document has been made widely available with comments invited by 9 June 2000. A copy of this document has been placed in the Library of the House.

During this consultation period presentations and discussions with staff and trade unions will also be arranged in order to address any issues and concerns regarding the PPP proposal prior to a final decision being made.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent consultation he has carried out with private sector defence contractors on the future of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency. [119034]

Mr. Hoon: Following the announcement in 1998 of a Public Private Partnership (PPP) for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (DERA), consultation has been an important and regular feature of the process. We have consulted with a wide range of key stakeholders, including private sector defence contractors. This has focused on formal industry bodies such as the National Defence Industry Council (NDIC) and Association of Independent Research and Technology Organisations (AIRTO), although there have been direct representations from individual companies. Last year's consultation exercise on a potential PPP solution produced valuable responses, which have informed the most recent phase of work.

The current consultation exercise, which I announced in the House on 17 April 2000, Official Report, columns 366–67W, will give all stakeholders the opportunity to submit their views on our revised proposals for the DERA public private partnership. We also plan to hold various consultation events with key stakeholders. I can assure my hon. Friend that views expressed will be taken into account before a final decision is made.

Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what percentage of shares in NewDERA plc he expects the Government to hold (a) on flotation of the new company and (b) as a minimum public holding. [120502]

Mr. Hoon: At this stage of the public private partnership (PPP) process it would be premature to determine the extent of a Government stake in the NewDERA company.

It is however the Government's objective that the company would be floated on the Stock Market as soon as its potential is judged to be suitably developed, which could be during 2001.

Initially, MOD is likely to retain a significant financial stake in NewDERA to ensure that taxpayers receive full value for their investment. However, retention of this stake would not be a long term position.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what plans are in place to ensure that information on experiments and the welfare of animals held at DERA will still be accessible when DERA is part-privatised; and if he will make a statement; [120131]

(2) what plans are in place to ensure that the welfare of animals held at DERA for experiments will be protected when it is part-privatised; and if he will make a statement. [120134]

Mr. Hoon: Animal Welfare within DERA is conducted strictly in accordance with the requirements of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 under which the Home Office licenses and oversees all such activity. These regulations, of course, apply to all private sector organisations, and will therefore continue to govern the welfare of any animals in defence research, whether in the public or the private sector.

Information held on defence research using animals within MOD will continue to be available as it is at present. However, subject to meeting all the requirements of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986, access to information on any such research carried out by the new private sector company will be a matter for that organisation to determine.

Regulation of Investigatory Powers Bill

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on his policy in respect of the use his Department, its agencies and public bodies will make of the powers relating to the authorised obtaining of communications data in Part I, Chapter II of the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Bill once the Bill is enacted. [119522]

Dr. Moonie: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to him on 19 April 2000, Official Report, column 509W, by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

RAF Staxton Wold

Mr. Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) when RAF Staxton Wold was first identified as a radar station suitable for downgrading to remote operation only; [119161]

(2) when he was first advised that RAF Staxton Wold should be downgraded to remote operation. [119162]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 18 April 2000]: I understand that formal consideration of the possibility of remote operation of the radar at RAF Staxton Wold was first given during the Departmental budgetary planning process which culminated in February 1997. This option was not pursued because a wider review of the then UK Air Defence Ground Environment (UKADGE) was started during the Strategic Defence Review.

Ministers in this Administration have never been advised that the radar at RAF Staxton Wold should be downgraded to remote operation. My predecessor was, however, advised in July 1998 that it would be possible to draw down the Station to minimum manning. Since the overall review of the UKADGE (now Air Surveillance and Control System—ASACS) was still being carried out at the time, he wished to await the outcome of this work and consider any wider implications before making a decision. I wrote to the hon. Gentleman on 9 August 1999 as soon as I had taken a decision (subject to consultation) on our plans for RAF Staxton Wold.

Balkans

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the total cost so far for United Kingdom operations in (a) Bosnia and (b) Kosovo, since forces entered the region; and if he will make a statement. [119166]

Mr. Spellar: The additional expenditure incurred each year by my Department in Bosnia and Kosovo is as follows:

£ million

Year	Bosnia	Kosovo
1993–94	26.6	0
1996–97	247.3	0
1997–98	196.5	0
1998–99	147.1	13.9
1999–2000	c.105	c.340

Estimate

Fatal Accident, Mr. Konjic Grad

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what satellite photographs exist of the fatal accident that took place on 7 July 1997 involving a Foden Thompson Carmichael MWD near Mrkonjic Grad. [118431]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 17 April 2000]: The Department does not have any satellite photographs of the accident. However, a number of aerial photographs exist and I am arranging for these to be placed in the Library of the House.

Relocation

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what relocation companies his Department uses when relocating civil servants and armed forces personnel. [119856]

Dr. Moonie: The Department uses Countrywide Mobility (HCR plc) to provide Service personnel with rented family and single accommodation in Great Britain on those occasions when there is a shortage of publicly funded accommodation. The Department uses three relocation companies, Cendant Relocation UK Ltd., Countrywide Mobility (HCR plc) and Morton Fraser Relocation to provide assistance to civil servants who have an entitlement to a move of home at public expense.

Helicopters

Mr. Martin Bell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will list the causes of the uncommanded flying control movements that have been reported on Chinook aircraft since 1994; [120103]

(2) what visual flying rules applied to support helicopters in June 1994. [120102]

Mr. Spellar: I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Serle's House

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what public access conditions have been agreed in relation to the sale of the remembrance garden at Serle's House. [119822]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 20 April 2000]: At present, none.

Plutonium Transfers

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the authorities in the United States which his Department consulted in order to draft paragraph 12 on United Kingdom-United States barter arrangements for plutonium transfers, contained in the report "United Kingdom's Defence Nuclear Programme", published on 14 April. [120253]

Mr. Spellar: The US Department of Energy was consulted on this report prior to publication.

KFOR

Mr. Donald Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what financial contribution each NATO and EU country has made to the cost of KFOR. [120087]

Mr. Spellar: My Department does not hold the information requested. The UK's costs are estimated to be £342 million for the financial year 1999–2000.

MOD Police (Sickness Absence)

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the rate of staff absences due to sickness for his Department's police for the last three years; and what assessment he has made of the rate relative to that of other public services. [120631]

Mr. Spellar: Ministry of Defence Police (MDP) sickness figures have been collected in hours since 1 April 1997 in order to give a truer measure of lost output. Since then the figures have been:

Per annum

	Average number of sickness hours per officer
1997–98	[1]113.08
1999–2000	120.85

The figures for 1998–99 and 1999–2000 are equivalent to 14.4 and 15.1 respectively days absence per officer per year. In 1998–99, the last year for which complete figures are available, the average number of working days lost to sickness per Home Department Police Officer in England and Wales was 11.7. It should be noted, however, that comparisons between forces are problematic owing to differences in methods of counting sick absence.

In recognition of the level of sick absence within the MDP, a sickness strategy was put into place early last year aimed at significantly reducing productive hours lost through sickness.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Regulation of Investigatory Powers Bill

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on his policy in respect of the use his Department, its agencies and public bodies will make of the powers relating to the authorised obtaining of communications data in Part I, Chapter II of the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Bill once the Bill is enacted. [119521]

Mr. Ingram: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by the Secretary of State for the Home Department on 19 April 2000, Official Report, column 509W.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much his Department spent (i) directly and (ii) indirectly on asylum seekers in (a) 1995, (b) 1996, (c) 1997, (d) 1998 and (e) 1999; and what estimate has been made of expenditure in the year 2000. [119488]

Mr. Mandelson: The Home Office will be responding to this question on behalf of the Government as a whole, using information that we have provided to them.

RUC/Army Base (Fermanagh)

Mr. Peter Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what the estimated repair cost is in respect of damage to the joint RUC/Army base at Annaghmartin, Roselea, County Fermanagh, as a result of the attack on 2 April. [119030]

Mr. Spellar: I have been asked to reply.

We estimate that £70,000 is the minimum amount necessary to repair the damaged base.

PRIME MINISTER

Active Aging

Ms Perham: To ask the Prime Minister when he intends to publish the report on Active Aging. [118008]

The Prime Minister: The Performance and Innovation Unit's report "Winning the Generation Game" was published on 27 April. Copies of the report have been placed in the Vote Office and the Libraries.

Cabinet Joint Consultative Committee

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to the oral statement by the Secretary of State for the Home Department on 5 April 2000, Official Report, columns 1021–29, concerning advice to Ministers, what impact the statement will have on the availability of information about the Cabinet Joint Consultative Committee, with particular reference to the dates of future meetings; the names of those invited to participate; and the topics to be discussed. [118930]

The Prime Minister: In the passage referred to, my right hon. Friend was speaking about factual and background information which has been used, or is intended to be used, to provide an informed background to decision-taking. In particular he clarified that further amendments would be made to clause 13 to ensure that there was a significant route for the release of such information.

The Joint Consultative Committee (JCC) is a deliberative committee. It does not have a decision-making role within collective Cabinet responsibility.

The release of information relating to discussions of the JCC would be subject to the proposed exemption in Clause 34 2(b) (ii) of the Bill, if its disclosure would inhibit the free and frank exchange of views for the purposes of deliberation. It would then have to be considered, under clause 13 of the Bill, whether the public interest in disclosing the information outweighed the public interest in maintaining the exemption.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

World Athletics Championships

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if it remains his policy that a venue suitable for staging the World Athletics Championships would require a capacity of about 60,000. [114146]

Kate Hoey [holding answer 14 March 2000]: My right hon. Friend does not have such a policy. UK Athletics have confirmed their key aims as being a stadium of 45,000–50,000 seats with support facilities to stage the World Athletics Championships.

Wembley Stadium

Mr. Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what assessment he made of Brent Council's policy in respect of transport infrastructure investment associated with the planned redevelopment of Wembley Stadium at the time that bids were submitted for the new National Stadium project. [119113]

Kate Hoey: None; bids for the new National Stadium project were submitted and consideration of the bids was entirely a matter for Sport England.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, pursuant to his answer of 24 March 2000, Official Report, column 708W, on Wembley Stadium, when he expects to receive confirmation from Sport England that they are happy with the appointment process in relation to the contract to build Wembley National Stadium. [119158]

Kate Hoey [holding answer 14 April 2000]: Sport England will not be able to confirm that they are happy with the appointment of a contractor under the terms of the Lottery funding agreement until that appointment has been made. I understand that Wembley National Stadium Ltd. is unlikely to appoint the contractor until planning permission has been secured.

Mr. Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) what discussions he has had with ministerial colleagues in the DETR about the desirability of new transport infrastructure projects in association with the proposed redevelopment of Wembley Stadium; [119120]

(2) what advice he has received from the Wembley Task Force about the (a) desirability and (b) cost of new transport infrastructure investment in association with the proposed redevelopment of Wembley Stadium. [119116]

Kate Hoey [holding answer 17 April 2000]: Neither I nor my right hon. Friend have discussed Wembley issues with DETR colleagues as this is a matter under active consideration by the Wembley Task Force. Given that the new Wembley Stadium is playing a major role in the regeneration of the Wembley Area, the Task Force has assessed the infrastructure requirements needed to support a world-class stadium, in a world-class environment, and is holding discussions with interested parties, including the London borough of Brent and Wembley National Stadium Ltd. to find ways in which a package can be put together to secure a successful development. These discussions are continuing.

No recommendations, views or proposals have been submitted by the Task Force to the Department on these infrastructure issues to date.

Mr. Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will place in the Library a copy of the Brent Council planning brief referred to in paragraph 13.4 of the Memorandum of Evidence provided by Sport England to the Culture, Media and Sport Committee in respect of the Committee's Fourth report of Session 1999–2000 (HC 164). [119117]

Kate Hoey [holding answer 17 April 2000]: I am placing a copy of the London Borough of Brent's planning brief in the House Library, today. Copies are also available at www.brent.gov.uk/wembley.

Mr. Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what advice he has received from Sport England on whether transport infrastructure investments were required as a condition of their grant of £120 million towards the redevelopment of Wembley Stadium. [119118]

Kate Hoey [holding answer 17 April 2000]: Sport England advises that transport infrastructure requirements were not required as a condition of the Lottery grant to Wembley National Stadium Ltd.

Mr. Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when (a) he and (b) officials in his Department were informed of the likely demand by Brent Council for a section 106 agreement for a £30 million transport infrastructure investment in connection with the granting of planning consent for the redevelopment of Wembley Stadium. [119119]

Kate Hoey [holding answer 17 April 2000]: The London Borough of Brent has consistently and publicly made clear its concern on transport and other infrastructure issues relating to the redevelopment of Wembley Stadium. DCMS Ministers and officials have been aware that the London Borough of Brent is seeking up to £30 million in a section 106 agreement for more than two years.

Athletics Stadium

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, pursuant to his answer of 24 March 2000, Official Report, column 707W, on what date copies of the brief submitted by UK Athletics were placed in the Library; and if he will make a statement. [119042]

Kate Hoey [holding answer 14 April 2000]: I apologise to the hon. Member that owing to an oversight within my Department copies of UK Athletics brief were placed in the Library only on 7 April.

National Lottery

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) what discussions he has had with the National Lottery concerning proposals for a National Endowment Fund for Sport and the Arts using reserve lottery funds; [119664]

(2) what discussions he has had with the Lottery Promotion Company Ltd. concerning their proposal for a National Endowment Fund for Sport and the Arts; [119665]

(3) what discussions has he had with the Lottery Promotion Company Ltd. concerning their proposals for allocation of moneys held in reserve. [119666]

Kate Hoey: I met Denis Vaughan, Executive Director of the Lottery Promotion Company, on 7 October 1999, to discuss the Lottery Promotion Company's proposals for the use of Lottery funds, including the establishment of a National Endowment for Sport and the Arts. Neither I, nor the Secretary of State, have discussed these proposals with the National Lottery Commission, the National Lottery distributing bodies, or the National Lottery operator, Camelot Group plc.

Tourism

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what recent discussions he has had with the English Tourism Council over its (a) inspection charge fees to small hotels and (b) charges made for inclusion in handbooks, directories and other advertising materials. [119719]

Janet Anderson: I have not discussed this directly, but I am aware the ETC have reviewed their pricing structure to ensure it strikes a fair balance between charges for large and small hotels. The inspection fees and other charges the ETC levies against small hotels for joining their accommodation grading scheme are operational matters for the ETC, which aims to break even and not make a profit. The hotelier receives back some of the fee when the inspector pays for an overnight stay.

The ETC's contractors and the other inspecting bodies (the AA and the RAC) now all inspect properties in England to precisely the same standards but each operates an independent inspection operation with its own scale of fees and package of benefits. It is for customers to choose the most appropriate service provider.

Sports Funding

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much was spent in the United Kingdom on sports provision per capita in 1999. [119724]

Kate Hoey: In the financial year 1999–2000, exchequer funding for sport in the United Kingdom, channelled through UK Sport and the four home country sports councils, totalled £69,779,000. In addition, Lottery sports funding drawn down by the five distributing bodies was £316,689,340 during this period. Using the 1998 population census, this amounts to per capita expenditure of £6.52 in 1999–2000.

Digital Broadcasting

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will set a target date for complete digital television coverage in England; and if he will make a statement. [119759]

Janet Anderson: The Government believe that it is possible that as early as 2006, and no later than 2010, all those who currently receive the free-to-air channels on analogue television will be able to receive those services digitally.

Turf Football Pitches

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, pursuant to his answer of 17 April, Official Report, column 321W, what size of population each (a) full-size and (b) half-size (or 5-a-side) synthetic turf pitches is expected to serve. [119988]

Kate Hoey: Sport England's initial analysis of gaps in synthetic pitch provision is based on each pitch serving a population of 60,000, within a 20 minute drive time. No work has yet to be carried out, nor is any planned, on the demand for half sized synthetic turf pitches.

TV Licences

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will examine the (a) practicability and (b) cost of collecting TV licence fees with the council tax. [119818]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 20 April 2000]: We have no such plans. It is not clear what benefits would accrue from collecting the licence fee locally which would outweigh the cost of establishing and running licence fee collection arrangements in each local authority area.

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what will be the cost of establishing the free television licence scheme for people aged over 75 years; and how much it will cost to administer in the first full year of operation. [119939]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 20 April 2000]: We estimate that in 2000–01, the cost of the concession will be £344 million, with an additional £23.4 million in administration costs in the first year.

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much (a) in total and (b) in addition to currently planned expenditure it would cost in (i) the UK and (ii) Scotland to give free TV licences to households headed by someone aged over 65 years. [119983]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 20 April 2000]: The information requested is not immediately available. I will write to the hon. Gentleman as soon as it is available and will place a copy of the letter in the Library. However, the figure will be for the UK in its entirety as no separate figures are kept for Scotland.

Birth Certificates

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport for what purposes his Department requires a birth certificate to be furnished by (a) employees, (b) contractors, (c) those applying for employment and contracts and (d) other persons. [120324]

Mr. Chris Smith: As one of its pre-recruitment checks, my Department requires new employees to the Civil Service either on permanent or short-term contracts to provide birth certificates or similar documentary evidence for one or more of the following purposes: proof of identity, proof of eligibility under the Civil Service nationality rules and proof of age. Contractors are required to produce them only if there are questions about identity.

Locomotives

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when locomotives based in the National Railway Museum were last out on the Colne to Preston line. [120326]

Mr. Alan Howarth: The National Railway Museum's locomotive "Green Arrow" hauled a special train over the Preston to Blackburn section of the route on 29 December 1999 en route to Carlisle via Settle.

Film Council

Mr. Ian Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when the Film Council will announce its strategy. [120792]

Mr. Chris Smith: The Film Council is today announcing its strategy for the development of film culture and the film industry in the UK. I have arranged for copies of the strategy document to be placed in the Library.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Minimum Wage

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the impact of the minimum wage on summary measures of inequality, with particular reference to the gini coefficient and Atkinson index; by what method the assessment was made; and if he will make a statement. [119826]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The Low Pay Commission looked in depth at the impact of the minimum wage on inequality and income distribution. As it says in its second report

> The impact of the national minimum wage on household incomes is complex, being affected by the way that statutory wage increases interact with the tax and benefits systems.

The issues of poverty and inequality are explored extensively in the Commission's Occasional Paper 2, published in June 1999. Overall, it found that the minimum wage, together with other tax and benefit changes, should prove a powerful tool in tackling in-work poverty.

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many employers have been reported by inspectors for paying less than the national minimum wage in (a) Britain, (b) Scotland and (c) the relevant area of record, which includes the constituency of Paisley, South. [120394]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The number of instances of employer non-compliance identified by minimum wage officers for the year ended 31 March 2000 is as follows:

(a) 1,280 employers in the UK, including Northern Ireland

(b) 105 employers in Scotland

A more localised disaggregation of these figures is not available.

Websites

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what his Department's policy is on (a) advertising and (b) acknowledging company sponsorship on the websites of his Department, agencies and non-departmental public bodies; which companies (i) have placed advertisements and (ii) are acknowledged as sponsors on those websites; how much revenue has been received for each financial year since 1997 from such advertisements and sponsorship; and if that revenue has been retained within the budget of his Department, agencies and non-departmental public bodies. [119542]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 19 April 2000]: The Department of Trade and Industry's policy on advertising on websites follows the guidance in the Central IT Unit's "Framework policy and guidelines for the use, management and design of public sector websites" (published last December as part of the e-government strategy). These state:

> Government sites are permitted to carry advertising. In designing pages, departments and agencies should ensure that advertisers' branding does not detract from the effectiveness and appearance of their own branding or that of government as a whole. Particular attention should be given to avoiding any implications of endorsement of products or services or of contradiction between government messages and those of contractors.

On sponsorship, the DTI also follows Cabinet Office guidance. The same policy is applied to websites as is applied to other forms of publication. In summary, sponsorship support can be sought where there is going to be a significant net benefit to the Department, at no detriment to the public interest. Any sponsorship arrangements are dealt with in ways that are even-handed and open, and on the basis that they must not conflict with the Department's regulatory and enforcement functions or appear to endorse a particular company, product or service.

In applying these policies, a number of DTI sites have been prepared in partnership with private sector organisations in return for acknowledgement of this sponsorship on the site. In a number of cases, sites delivering the objectives of the Department are run and financed by private sector companies which are allowed to enter advertising and sponsorship arrangements with others. Compiling a comprehensive list of companies which have been involved in such arrangements to date would incur disproportionate cost.

No direct revenue has been received to date from either advertising or sponsorship.

None of the non-departmental public bodies for which the Department is responsible has accepted advertising or acknowledged sponsorship from companies on its website. I have asked the Chief Executives of the Department's agencies to write to the hon. Member separately where they have a substantive reply.

Letter from J. S. Holden to Mr. Robert Maclennan, dated 2 May 2000:

I have been asked to reply to your recently tabled Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in respect of Companies House Executive Agency.

(i) It is Companies House policy not to carry advertising on our web site.

(ii) Companies House web site is not sponsored.

(iii) As we have no advertisements or sponsors on our web site, I confirm we have received no revenue from this source for retention within our budgets.

Letter from Alison Brimelow to Mr. Robert Maclennan, dated 2 May 2000:

In the Patent Office, the policy is not to accept advertising or company sponsorship on The Patent Office website. No companies therefore have placed advertisements or been acknowledged as sponsors on the website, and no revenue has been received.

Letter from Peter Joyce to Mr. Robert Maclennan, dated 2 May 2000:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question about advertising and company sponsorship on The Insolvency Service web site.

The Insolvency Service does not have any advertising on or company sponsorship of its web site. This has been the case since the launch of the web site.

Letter from Ian Jones to Mr. Robert Maclennan, dated 2 May 2000:

You tabled a Parliamentary Question on 13 April 2000 to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry concerning the policy on sponsorship, advertising and any resulting revenue, for web sites operated by the department and its executive agencies. I have been asked to reply in respect of the Employment Tribunals Service (ETS) which is an executive agency of the DTI.

The Employment Tribunals Service provides the administrative support to the Employment Tribunals and Employment Appeal Tribunals. As such, no advertising would be permitted, nor any sponsorship sought, for any site maintained or contributed to by the agency.

The agency has a small entry on the main DTI web site. The only web site directly maintained by the agency is that of the Employment Appeal Tribunal although a parallel site for the Employment Tribunals is under consideration.

I hope this information is helpful, please let me know if there is any further information that you require.

Letter from David Hendon to Mr. Robert Maclennan, dated 2 May 2000:

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has asked me to reply on behalf of the Radiocommunications Agency to your Parliamentary Question about advertising and company sponsorship on the RA website.

It is the policy of Radiocommunications Agency not to accept advertising or company sponsorship on its website.

No such advertisements or sponsorship have been placed on the RA website and no revenue for such services has been received by the Agency.

Letter from Seton Bennett to Mr. Robert Maclennan, dated 2 May 2000:

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has asked me to reply on behalf of NWML to your question regarding advertising/sponsorship on our web site.

The NWML website currently does not carry any sponsorship or advertising. The site has been set up to transfer knowledge to NWML's stakeholders-Trading Standards Officers, weighing and measuring equipment manufacturers, DTI, other customers and interested parties.

If in the future NWML was approached by a potential sponsor or advertiser, the idea would be thoroughly considered because it may provide an opportunity to raise additional revenue, however it would not be at the detriment of the quality of information provided to NWML's stakeholders.

Letter from David Irwin to Mr. Robert Maclennan, dated 2 May 2000:

I have been asked to reply in respect of the Small Business Service to your recently tabled Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, about advertising and sponsorship on Departmental websites.

The SBS website has no plans to allow advertising at present and no adverts have been placed on the site. The site does not carry any references to sponsorship.

The Enterprise Zone website is a gateway to business information for SMEs. It narrows down the mass of information available on the Internet to the most relevant, providing a single point of access to useful information. Launched in 1997 by the DTI and supported by Business Links, it is maintained and operated by the Dialog Corporation plc. DTI's agreement with Dialog allows the company to enter into normal, commercial arrangements with advertisers—to which the Department is not a party. The financial details of such arrangements are subject to commercial confidentiality.

Post Offices (London)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many (a) post offices and (b) sub-post offices have closed in the Greater London area during the last five years. [119845]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The Post Office tell me that it does not hold historical data by region, including Greater London, for the numbers of post offices which have closed or opened.

Land Rover

Miss Kirkbride: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 14 April 2000, Official Report, column 288W, if discussions on the purchase of Land Rover from BMW by Ford were commercially confidential. [119843]

Mr. Alan Johnson: I made clear in my earlier reply that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has many contacts with companies including the Ford Motor Company. The issues discussed are often commercially sensitive and the company's requests for confidentiality respected.

Council for Science and Technology

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 18 April 2000, Official Report, column 433W, about new appointments to the Council for Science and Technology, what the gender balance is on the new council and whether the gender balance of the expanded council is in line with Government targets for the representation of women on public bodies; how many women candidates (a) were considered for appointment to the Council and (b) met the criteria for appointment to the council; what steps his Department took to increase the pool of women candidates for appointment to the council; when he will next have an opportunity to improve the gender balance on the council; what steps he is taking in other parts of the scientific advisory system to compensate for the low representation of women on the Council for Science and Technology; and what consultation he has had with the Minister for Women on ways to increase women's participation in his Department's scientific advisory system. [120305]

Mr. Byers: Of the 16 independent members of the Council for Science and Technology, three are women (19 per cent.).

Of the 23 candidates considered for appointment to the Council during the most recent round, five were women, two of whom subsequently decided not to pursue their candidacy.

In identifying these candidates and making the appointments, my Department complied with the guidance of the Commissioner for Public Appointments. We canvassed widely, both internally among other Government Departments and externally among such organisations as the CBI, IoD, TUC, the CVCP, the Research Councils and the Higher Education Funding Councils. Nominations from existing members of the Council were also sought.

The next round of appointments to the Council is due to commence in September 2000, when we will continue to seek to increase the proportion of women on the Council, in accordance with my Department's published goal of reaching 33 per cent. representations of women by 2002 in making appointments to our non-departmental public bodies.

Companies House

Ms Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what guidance he has given to (a) Government agencies and (b) Companies House about the hospitality managers may accept from companies with which they are outsourcing contracts. [120190]

Dr. Howells: The guidance contained within the Department's Procurement Manual which is available to DTI Agencies including Companies House, sets out advice regarding gifts and hospitality in respect of dealings with contractors. A copy of the Manual is in the Library of the House.

Ms Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what evaluation he has made of Capita's performance in Companies House, Cardiff. [120212]

Dr. Howells: Evaluation of Capita's performance is carried out systematically against a range of service levels and targefs defined in the contract under which they provide telephone inquiry and search services on behalf of Companies House.

Export Licences

Mr. Berry: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what changes have been made in the last three years to the guidelines on end-use assurance required for companies and individuals applying for single individual export licences for strategic goods. [120205]

Dr. Howells: There have been some amendments made to the guidelines on end-use assurance in the last three years with regard to information requirements for certain chemicals listed in Schedules to the Chemical Weapons Convention. Other changes have been ones of format rather than substance.

Mr. Berry: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if Export Control Organisation guidelines detailing end-use assurance required for export licence applications apply to open individual export licences for strategic goods. [120203]

Dr. Howells: The end-use assurance requirements for an open individual export licence are included in the conditions of such a licence. Guidance is provided for compliance with these conditions.

Disabled People (New Technologies)

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to draw upon the experience of internet companies in providing disabled people with (a) access to and (b) training in, new technologies. [120197]

Ms Hewitt: As a response to the Social Exclusion Unit's 1998 report, the Prime Minister set up a series of high level action teams to devise a new national strategy for neighbourhood renewal. Policy Action Team 15 (PAT15), which was led by DTI, looked at how information and communication technologies (ICTs) can help.

PAT15's main task was to improve the access to and uptake of ICTs by the most disadvantaged in society. It carried out an in-depth study of projects already operating in poor neighbourhoods to identify best practice which may be replicable elsewhere. It also commissioned papers to examine how issues associated with disability can be addressed. The consultation process included input from the private sector, particularly through representatives from ICT companies working as PAT members.

Their report indicates that public access facilities, the training provided and the content used should take into account the needs of different audiences, including people with disabilities. The recommendations from the report are being taken forward by the DfEE. The final report is available on the PAT15 website (www.PAT15.org.uk).

Much work, however, is already under way. £252 million of Capital Modernisation Funding (CMF) has been promised to set up around 700 ICT learning centres within the 2000 most deprived council wards and other areas with special needs, such as isolated rural areas. These centres will be set up from September 2000, to provide hands on learning for people for example with disabilities or from ethnic backgrounds with little or no ICT skills or access to ICT. They will provide a local place for local people and will give people the opportunity to gain ICT skills.

The development of this initiative has included input from the private sector through externally commissioned work or through representatives of ICT companies sitting on the project's management board.

More details about the initiative can be found on the ICT Learning Centres website on www.dfee.gov.uk/ict-learning-centres.

Social Exclusion (Internet)

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what initiatives he will implement to encourage internet businesses to assist in tackling the problems of deprived areas. [120198]

Ms Hewitt: Following the Social Exclusion Unit's (SEU) 1998 report on deprived neighbourhoods, 18 high level action teams were set up to help devise a new national strategy for neighbourhood renewal. Their main conclusions have now been drawn together in a framework document for consultation (available on the SEU's website: www.cabinet-office.gov.uk/seu).

The report identifies that business has a crucial role and much to contribute in helping to turn around deprived neighbourhoods. It also points out that businesses need recognition and encouragement to become actively involved in projects which aim, for example, to raise education standards, improve health, tackle crime, and help to build communities in deprived areas. The Government are keen to see an increase in the number and range of businesses, including internet businesses, which are actively engaged in addressing the problems of deprived neighbourhoods. The consultation paper seeks views on what the Government could do to encourage business engagement in the community.

There are, however, a number of initiatives already under way. In particular, the DTI has:

Established a Ministerial Champion for Corporate Social Responsibility, to improve Whitehall understanding of what this means and how it can best work. This role has been added to the portfolio of the Minister for Consumer and Corporate Affairs in DTI;

Sponsored the Business in The Community Examples of Excellence Awards, which highlight outstanding achievements in the field of CSR;

Sponsored a project on 'Innovation Through Partnership'. This project will analyse how through engagement in partnerships with the voluntary and public sector, businesses can become more innovative organisations;

Undertaken a project to identify the benefits to businesses from forming a relationship with a local school or college; and

Examined the intangible assets of business including the role of ethics in contributing to value creation in companies of all sizes;

Committed itself to providing enhanced business support for the disadvantaged through the Small Business Service; the Business Volunteer Mentors Association; and the Community Finance Initiative Challenge.

Working with Business in the Community's 'community' programme to engage business in supporting the community's use of information and communication technologies (ICTs).

Ilisu Dam

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on progress made on the full environmental impact assessment report for the Ilisu Dam. [120264]

Mr. Caborn: Work is proceeding on the Environmental Impact Assessment Report; however the Report is now not expected to be complete until July 2000 at the earliest. The overall project timetable is similarly delayed.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent discussions he has had with the Turkish Government concerning consultations with those directly affected by the Ilisu Dam. [120265]

Mr. Caborn: While I have had no direct contact with the Turkish Government concerning the consultations, I understand that consultations are on-going with those who are affected by the Ilisu Dam and that detailed surveys of the local population are to take place.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent discussions he has had with Balfour Beatty concerning the provision of export credit for the Ilisu Dam. [120272]

Mr. Caborn: I have had no discussions, although my officials do continue to discuss details of the case with Balfour Beatty and the other interested Export Credit Agencies concerning the provision of export credit for the Ilisu Dam. No decision has been taken regarding the availability of ECGD support for this project.

Regional Assistance

Judy Mallaber: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many applications have been submitted in each of the years since 1993 to date for (a) regional selective assistance and (b) enterprise grant in each region; and how many have been successful. [120653]

Mr. Caborn: This information is published in the Industrial Development Act 1982, Annual Report, copies of which are available in the Library of the House.

Employment Tribunals

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many (a) women and (b) black people applied to be lay advisers in the last round of appointments for the employment tribunals in England and Wales; and how many of those in (i) and (ii) applied to serve on the Cardiff tribunal. [120374]

Mr. Alan Johnson: In the 1999 exercise to recruit new lay members to the employment tribunals in Great Britain, applications were received from 3,728 women and 336 people who described their ethnic origin as black-African or black-Caribbean. No separate figures are available for England and Wales. There were 85 women and three black-African or black-Caribbean applicants to serve on the Cardiff employment tribunal.

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many (a) women and (b) black people serve on employment tribunals in England and Wales; and how many serve on Cardiff tribunals. [120373]

Mr. Alan Johnson: 644 women and 51 people who describe their ethnic origin as black-African or black-Caribbean serve on the employment tribunals in England and Wales. 43 women and one black-African/black-Caribbean serve at the Cardiff employment tribunal.

P. W. Allen and Company

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he will make a decision on whether to allow Export Licence Application QX 96/00 to P. W. Allen and Company in Tewkesbury. [120614]

Dr. Howells: Export licence application QX 96/00 has been approved, and the licence was issued on 20 April 2000.

Milk Marque

Mr. Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the prospects for vertical integration available for the three organisations that replaced Milk Marque. [120327]

Mr. Byers: Following the voluntary decision by the members of Milk Marque to break up into three independent successors, I asked the Director General of Fair Trading (DGFT) to monitor the operation of the market this winter, and report his conclusions by Easter.

That advice has now been received. The DGFT has advised that Milk Link, Axis and Zenith, the three successors to Milk Marque, have been operating independent arrangements for the marketing and selling of their members' milk this winter.

I can announce today that, on the basis that the assurances given last year of independent operation will continue to be observed, I can see no reason why Milk Link, Axis and Zenith should not establish or extend their processing activities if they choose to do so.

The assurances given were that all policy making and selling of milk would be carried out independently by each of the successors with no joint ventures between the new businesses in marketing or processing milk, with no common directors and no shareholdings by any one of the new businesses in either of the others. Milk Marque also stated that they would not supply to the successor bodies, after 31 March 2001, central services which could not be split prior to the reorganisation which took place last year. Should the new businesses choose to extend their processing activities through acquisition they will of course be subject to the merger provisions under competition law in the same way as any other company. In addition, Milk Link, Axis and Zenith must, like all undertakings, operate their businesses in accordance with both domestic and European competition law.

Gordon and Innes Ltd.

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the financial accounts for Gordon and Innes Ltd. of Huntly, Aberdeenshire were due for filing; and if they have been received. [120647]

Dr. Howells: The accounts due to 31 October 1998 for Gordon and Innes Ltd., now registered at 8 West Street, Fochabers, IV32 7DJ, were due to be filed by 30 November 1999, but to date they have not been received.

The company has been reminded of its obligations to file its accounts and the consequences if they are not received.

Sudan

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent discussions he has had with BP Amoco concerning its investment with Talisman Energy and the China National Petroleum Corporation operating in Sudan. [120269]

Mr. Caborn: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has not had the opportunity to meet with BP Amoco to discuss their investment with Talisman Energy and the China National Petroleum Corporation operating in Sudan.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent discussions he has had with (a) Weir Pumps of Glasgow, (b) Allen Power Engineering of Bradford and (c) Angus Fire of Oxfordshire concerning the manufacturing of parts for oil exploration in Sudan. [120268]

Mr. Caborn: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has not had the opportunity to meet any of the aforementioned companies to discuss the oil industry in Sudan.

My Department, in conjunction with our colleagues at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, have offered, and will continue to offer, full and frank advice to British companies who are interested in the oil industry in Sudan.

Internet

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to protect the names of cities, towns, villages and private houses from being registered as Internet domain names by commercial organisations for trading purposes without permission of the legitimate bearers; and if he will make a statement. [120263]

Ms Hewitt: Domain Names in the UK are managed by Nominet UK, an independent not-for-profit body. The Government are discussing with Nominet the way forward on this issue. Nominet is consulting with the Scottish Parliament on this subject, and will shortly be consulting with other regional bodies. Civic organisations and other non-profit groups who wish to register domain names incorporating place names should be able to do so in the org.uk Second Level Domain. They can do this by contacting an Internet Service Provider or if necessary they can contact Nominet directly at www.nominet.org.uk.

TREASURY

Tax System

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what (a) initiatives relating to and (b) reviews of, the tax system he has launched since May 1997; on what dates each (i) was completed and (ii) is expected to be completed; and if he will make a statement. [118857]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 17 April 2000]: The information has been placed in the Library.

Cancer Statistics

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will (a) list and (b) make a statement on the incidence of and death rates from (i) cervical cancer, (ii) breast cancer, (iii) prostate cancer and (iv) testicular cancer in each of the last three years in each health authority. [119728]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Alan Goldsmith to Dr. Jenny Tonge, dated 2 May 2000:

The Director for the Office for National Statistics (ONS) has been asked to reply to your recent question asking for a statement and list of death rates for (a) cervical, (b) female breast, (c) prostate and (d) testicular cancer by health authority for the three latest years available. I am replying in the Director's absence.

The data relates to all the 99 health authorities in England, the tables are very large and so will not appear in the Official Report. I will arrange for a copy to be made available in the House of Commons Library.

Personal Services Companies

Sir Brian Mawhinney: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what factors account for the change from the initial estimate of annual forecast revenue receipts from IR35. [120329]

Dawn Primarolo: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Mr. Ottaway) on 5 April 2000, Official Report, column 494W.

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the additional amount of tax that will be collected in each of the next three years as a result of the introduction of IR35; and if he will make a statement. [120366]

Dawn Primarolo: The estimate of extra tax and National Insurance Contributions generated from the pre-announced measure to tackle avoidance through the use of personal service companies is provided in Table A2.1 of the March 2000 "Financial Statement and Budget Report".

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the development of a database of small businesses who breach IR35 rules. [120365]

Dawn Primarolo: We expect intermediaries involved in contracts affected by the legislation to comply with the rules, and the Inland Revenue will provide information and support to enable them to do so. Those who do not will be identified and reviewed by Inland Revenue compliance officers using existing compliance methods.

A separate database of intermediaries who breach the rules will not be needed.

Double Taxation Relief

Mr. Jack: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will publish details of the methodology used by the Inland Revenue to calculate the increase in tax yield that will result from the proposed changes in tax legislation as it affects offshore mixer companies; [120291]

(2) if he will publish details of the calculations undertaken by the Inland Revenue to determine the level of tax yield arising from his proposals in the Finance Bill dealing with controlled foreign companies and tax mixing arrangements. [120290]

Dawn Primarolo: The expected yield from these changes as set out in Table A.13 of the 2000 "Financial Statement and Budget Report" is based on accepted methodology used by all Governments.

Mr. Jack: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the feasibility of tax mixing onshore. [120288]

Dawn Primarolo: The issues concerning a system of onshore pooling were fully discussed in the paper "Double taxation relief for companies" published by the Inland Revenue in March 1999.

Mr. Jack: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer which G7 and OECD countries allow tax mixing to take place. [120285]

Dawn Primarolo: Just as overall tax systems vary from country to country, so do their respective mechanisms for relieving double taxation. It is not likely that any two countries will have double taxation relief systems that are identical. Direct comparisons are therefore of limited value and can be misleading.

Unfair Tax Competition

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the policy of (a) the Government and (b) the European Commission is on the level of (i) income tax and (ii) corporation tax which should be treated as constituting unfair tax competition. [120359]

Dawn Primarolo: General rates of corporation tax and income tax do not constitute unfair tax competition.

Family Benefits

Mr. Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 3 April 2000, Official Report, column 340W, on family benefits, how many of those families claiming working families tax credit in each month since its introduction would have been entitled to family credit. [120617]

Dawn Primarolo: I refer my right hon. Friend to the answer I gave him on 19 April 2000, Official Report, column 580W.

VAT

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the Government's policy is on the proposal for VAT to become an EU levied tax. [120356]

Dawn Primarolo: In July 1996 the Commission published a programme for creating a common system for EC VAT. The Government see no case for VAT reform along those lines, and such a system could not be agreed without the UK's consent.

Insurance

Dr. Cable: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to (a) repeal and (b) amend the Industrial Assurance Act 1923. [120211]

Miss Melanie Johnson: I refer the hon. Gentlemen to the answer given by the Financial Secretary to the Treasury to my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Cousins) on 18 April 2000, Official Report, column 438W.

Small Hotels (VAT)

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the advantages and disadvantages of introducing a graduated VAT threshold for small hotels. [120627]

Dawn Primarolo: Customs and Excise has been working with small businesses and representative bodies, including representatives of the tourist industry, to explore ways to ease the impact of VAT for all small businesses once their turnover reaches the VAT registration threshold, including graduated VAT relief.

Family Statistics

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the life expectancy of someone whose parents have (a) been divorced and (b) remained married. [120668]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested is not available.

Retired People

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of people retiring in (a) 1985, (b) 1990, (c) 1995, (d) 1996 (e) 1997, (f) 1998 and (g) 1999 have taken a tax-free lump sum from (i) defined contribution schemes and (ii) defined benefit schemes; and how much tax revenue was forgone as a result. [120361]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested is not available.

Child Support

Mr. Woolas: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to include CSA payments in calculating eligibility for working families tax credit. [120656]

Dawn Primarolo: Maintenance payments, claimed through the CSA, are not currently included in calculating eligibility for the Working Families Tax Credit. There are no plans at present to alter this treatment.

Tax Law Rewrite Project

Mrs. Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what further progress has been made on the Tax Law Rewrite project. [120795]

Dawn Primarolo: I am pleased to be able to tell the House that the Tax Law Rewrite project is continuing to make very good progress. The Inland Revenue have today published the project's tenth Exposure Draft, containing draft rewritten clauses on trading income of individuals. Copies of the Exposure Draft will be placed in the Libraries of the House.

Climate Change Levy

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the estimated cost of extending the 80 per cent. discount on the climate change levy to horticulture for the financial year 2001–02. [119916]

Mr. Timms: The 80 per cent. discount on the climate change levy is available only to sectors covered by the Integrated Pollution Prevention and Control Directive (IPPC) who enter into negotiated agreements to deliver additional improvements in energy efficiency. This reflects the additional regulatory burden on such firms, who must implement all cost-effective energy saving measures in order to qualify for a discount.

The horticulture industry is not covered by IPPC and is therefore not eligible for the 80 per cent. discount. Nevertheless, the Government recognise the unique position of horticulture as an energy intensive sector exposed to international competition, and where there is scope for energy savings to be made.

The Government therefore intend to give a package of support from the £50 million 'energy efficiency' fund to improve the sector's energy efficiency, and have included thermal screens, which are used in glasshouses, in the list of technologies eligible for the enhanced capital allowance. And the Government intend to offer a temporary 50 per cent. discount to protect the competitiveness or horticulture firms while these energy efficiency measures take effect.

Final decisions on the exact design of the package of support to horticulture have yet to be taken. It is therefore not possible to quantify exactly the cost of the package.

Mr. Jack: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will place in the Library the economic impact studies which he has conducted on the climate change levy. [120287]

Mr. Timms: Copies of the Regulatory Impact Assessment of the climate change levy are available in the Library.

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the cost to local authorities of the climate change levy with particular reference to (a) street lighting, (b) leisure services and (c) housing; and what support he plans to make available to local authorities to meet such costs. [120630]

Mr. Timms: The Government believe that all sectors of the economy must play their part in helping meet the UK's targets for reducing greenhouse gas emissions.

It is not possible to say with precision what the effects of the climate change levy on local authority services will be since that will depend on, among other things, future energy use in this sector. However, local authorities will be overall net gainers from the climate change levy package, since they will gain more from the associated cut in employer NICs than they will pay in climate change levy.

Public Bodies (Overpayments)

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will assess the practicability of introducing a 90-day limitation period for the recovery of overpaid sums by public bodies. [120353]

Mr. Timms: We have no plans to review the current rules on recovery of overpayments. The rules are designed to protect the public purse while also ensuring that the recipients of overpayments are treated fairly.

Fraud Savings

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 7 April 2000, Official Report, column 627W, on fraud, if he will list (a) the cost and duration of each initiative since 1 May 1997, (b) estimate the contribution in fraud savings each initiative has made and (c) estimate the fraud savings for each of the last three years for each benefit affected by such initiatives. [119216]

Mr. Rooker: The information is in the table. I refer my right hon. Friend to the written answer on savings I gave on 7 April 2000, Official Report, column 627W.

Child Support Agency

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what budget the CSA allocates towards welfare assessment; in which of the last six years there has been an underspend; and how much. [119570]

Angela Eagle: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the Chief Executive, Mrs. Faith Boardman. She will write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Mrs. Faith Boardman to Ms Oona King, dated 2 May 2000:

I am replying to your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about the Child Support Agency.

You ask about the Agency's budget allocation towards welfare assessments and I have taken the term 'welfare assessment' to mean child maintenance assessments. Unfortunately the information you require is not available.

The main role of the Agency is the accurate assessment and collection of child support maintenance and we aim to do this in the most efficient and cost effective way and to ensure that children receive the financial support to which they are entitled.

The Agency is funded on outputs that reflect our targets and focus on customer service. The Secretary of State requires the Agency to live within its allocation of cash resources and this has been achieved. In addition, over the past three years the Agency has improved overall efficiency by 48 per cent. and expects to exceed this figure by 1999–2000.

I hope this is helpful.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the cost of running the Child Support Agency in each year since its establishment; and how much money was recovered in each year from absent parents. [119765]

Angela Eagle: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the Chief Executive, Mrs. Faith Boardman. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Mrs. Faith Boardman to Mr. Gerald Howarth, dated 2 May 2000:

I am replying to your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about the Child Support Agency.

You asked for details of the cost of running the CSA since its establishment. Details of running cost expenditure are summarised in the attached annex. These figures are based on the Appropriation Account for the Administration and Miscellaneous Services Vote (Vote 3) for each year.

You also asked for details of maintenance recovered in each year from non-resident parents. Details of the amount of maintenance collected and arranged are also summarised in the annex. These figures take into account maintenance collected from non-resident parents and maintenance assessed by the Agency but paid directly by the non-resident parent to the parent with care. You will see that we have been unable to provide figures for 1993/94 and 1994/95. This was because in those years the focus of the Secretary of State's targets was upon annual benefit savings and the total amount of maintenance collected and arranged was not then a target.

CSA running costs (from inception)

£ million

Financial year	Gross amount	Net of VAT	Collected and arranged
1993–94	104	—	—
1995–96	180	—	301
1996–97	205	203	400
1997–98	209	208	574
1998–99	201	—	661

Notes:

1. All figures include an element for repayment to DHSS Northern Ireland in respect of Belfast CSAC.
2. Figures for 1996–97 and 1997–98—in accordance with HM Treasury instructions information was reported in the Appropriation Account net of VAT but for information both gross (which compare year on year) and net figures have been provided.

Civil Servants (Relocation)

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security which relocation companies his Department uses when relocating civil servants. [119857]

Mr. Rooker: This Department has, since June 1998, had a three year contract with Cendant Relocation UK Limited to provide a homesale service to employees. When a transfer attracting relocation expenses has been agreed it is the officer's decision to use the homesale service or try to sell their properties themselves.

Inter-ministerial Group on Countering Fraud

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) of 17 April 2000, Official Report, column 403W, on the Inter-ministerial Group for Older People, if he will publish the same information for the Inter-ministerial Group on Countering Fraud. [120243]

Mr. Rooker: The membership of the Inter-Ministerial Group on Welfare Fraud is as follows:

The right hon. Jeff Rooker—Minister of State, Department of Social Security

Nick Raynsford—Minister of State, Department of Environment, Transport and the Regions

The right hon. Tessa Jowell—Minister of State, Department for Education and Employment

The right hon. Richard Caborn—Minister of State, Department for Trade and Industry

Mike O'Brien—Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department

Lord Hunt—Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health

David Lock—Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department

Dawn Primarolo—Paymaster General, Her Majesty's Treasury

Brian Wilson—Minister of State, Scotland Office

David Hanson—Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales.

The Group's remit was set out in the Green Paper "Beating fraud is everyone's business" published in July 1998.

We do not routinely reveal dates of meetings or the content of discussion between groups of Ministers as this could inhibit the necessary free and frank exchange of views within Government. However, we will do so where such an exchange of views would not be inhibited.

I refer my right hon. Friend to my Written Answer on 17 April 2000, Official Report, columns 403–04W.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what the cost would be of increasing the earnings disregard for people in work claiming housing benefit by (a) 10 per cent., (b) 15 per cent. and (c) 20 per cent. in (i) Scotland and (ii) the UK. [119979]

Angela Eagle [holding answer 20 April 2000]: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

Cost in 2000–01 of increasing the earnings disregard for people in work claiming Housing Benefit by 10 per cent., 15 per cent. and 20 per cent. in Scotland and Great Britain

£ million

Notes:

1. Based on the 1997–98 Family Resources Survey and Housing Benefit Administrative data for May 1998.
2. The figures are rounded to the nearest £1 million. The level of rounding reflects the fact that some of the figures are based on small samples and may be subject to a high degree of variability.
3. The Family Resources Survey only covers households in Great Britain, so figures which include Northern Ireland cannot be provided.

Birth Certificates

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security for what purposes his Department requires a birth certificate to be furnished by (a) employees, (b) contractors, (c) those applying for employment and contracts and (d) other persons. [120313]

Mr. Rooker: This Department and its Agencies require new employees to provide proof of identity and their date of birth, and the provision of their birth certificate is one means of doing this. However, a birth certificate is only required in the absence of other documentation, usually a passport. The Department and its executive Agencies do not ask for birth certificates from contractors or from those seeking a contract.

The Benefits Agency does not insist on seeing birth certificates of new claimants of Social Security benefits to verify their identity, except when they are claiming certain benefits such as Retirement Pensions and Child Benefit. For other Social Security benefits, other forms of documentation are also acceptable.

The Child Support Agency will ask for sight of a qualifying child's birth certificate where there is a paternity dispute to establish whether or not the non-resident parent is shown on the birth certificate. It is unlikely for the Agency to request a birth certificate in any other circumstances, as the dates of birth for qualifying children are verified for the purposes of Child Benefit.

Benefit Payments

Mr. Dobbin: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many recipients of benefits have them paid (a) into a bank account and (b) through the Post Office. [120098]

Mr. Rooker: As at November 1999, 9.1 million (about 36 per cent.) of all benefit recipients were receiving payment directly into a bank account, and 16.1 million (around 63 per cent.) were collecting payment by order book or girocheque at the post office. The remaining 1 per cent. was paid by other methods of payment into banks, for example, payable orders and a small proportion of girocheques paid into bank accounts.

Inter-Ministerial Groups

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the names of those Inter-Ministerial Groups whose (a) membership and (b) dates of meetings have been withheld in response to parliamentary questions. [120241]

Mr. Rooker: Social Security Ministers chair two Inter-Ministerial Groups; the Inter-Ministerial Group on Older People and the Inter-Ministerial Group on Welfare Fraud. The membership and remit of both these groups are in the public arena.

We do not routinely reveal dates of meetings or the content of discussion between groups of Ministers as this could inhibit the necessary free and frank exchange of views within Government. However, we will do so where such an exchange of views would not be inhibited.

Pensions

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the (a) number and (b) proportion of pensioners who at the point of retirement had weekly income from pensions and other sources greater than their basic state retirement pension (i) 30 years ago, (ii) 25 years ago, (iii) 20 years ago, (iv) 15 years ago, (v) 10 years ago, (vi) five years ago and (vii) at the point when the latest available data were collected. [120240]

Mr. Rooker: I regret the information is not available.

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what recommendations have been made by the Retirement Income Working Party; and if he will make a statement. [120202]

Mr. Rooker: The Retirement Income Working Party is an independent body and has no links with Government. We welcome this report and are studying its recommendations. We understand that both full and summary versions of this report are available on the internet at www.bbk.ac.uk/res/pi/reports.

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what advice he is giving to people who have no record of a phone-call made reassuring them about future SERPs entitlement in respect of the compensation scheme. [120127]

Mr. Rooker: As our right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said in his statement to the House on the 15 March, we shall put before the House full details of the inherited SERPS scheme, including what information we will require from those wishing to claim and the procedures that will be followed to scrutinise those claims.

We fully accept the report of the Parliamentary Commissioner for Public Administration into inherited SERPS, which concludes at paragraph 32 that the burden of proof in the scheme rests on this Department.

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much it will cost in (a) the UK and (b) Scotland to increase the basic state pension for the (i) over 70s and (ii) over 80s by (1) £2, (2) £3, (3) £4, (4) £5 and (5) £10 a week. [119970]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 20 April 2000]: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many pensioners in the last three financial years have switched from weekly cash payments to four-weekly automated credit transfer; and what assessment has been made of the amount that has been saved in administrative costs as a result; [120195]

(2) what was the average annual cost of administering the payment of retirement pension by cash to pensioners who receive their payment in cash on a weekly basis, in each of the last three years for which figures are available; [120193]

(3) what was the average annual cost of administering the payment of retirement pension by automated credit transfer to pensioners who receive their payment by ACT on a four-weekly basis, in each of the last three years for which figures are available. [120194]

Mr. Rooker: Information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

Note:

Approximately 2.3 per cent. of pensioners receive payment by ACT 13 weekly or annually.

The information on administration costs and savings is not available to the detail required. Information on the total annual cost of administering the payment of Retirement Pension is collated but not split by method of payment.

For information, the total annual cost of administering Retirement Pension in the last three years currently available is:

1996–97	302
1998–99	314

Mortgages

Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to draw up regulations to disregard the value of ISA funds backing a mortgage, where someone with an ISA mortgage has to claim (a) Income Support and (b) income-based Jobseeker's Allowance in the same way the value of an endowment policy backing a mortgage is exempted. [120227]

Mr. Rooker: We have no plans to do so.

Domestic Violence

Ms Moran: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what statistics are collected by his Department on evidence of domestic violence in reports prepared by social workers for courts considering issuing child contact orders. [119576]

Mr. Hutton: I have been asked to reply.

Reports on evidence of domestic violence would be prepared by court welfare officers, social workers and other relevant staff at the direction of the judge considering applications for child contact orders. As such, the reports would be documents of the court, and therefore not routinely available (unless at the judge's discretion) for wider circulation or statistical analysis.

HEALTH

Patient Representation

18. Mrs. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to strengthen the system of representation of patients' views in the NHS. [119071]

Ms Stuart: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North (Mr. Rapson), Official Report, column 8.

Hospital Hygiene

19. Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the Government's plans for improving standards of hygiene in hospitals. [119072]

Mr. Denham: Trust Chief Executives are responsible for ensuring that there are high standards of cleanliness and hygiene in hospitals. The infection Control Nurses Association and the Association of Domestic Mangers have recently produced new "Standards for Environmental Cleanliness in Hospitals", which National Health Service Estates will be publishing shortly and sending to all NHS trusts. The controls assurance framework, published on 22 November 1999 has a section relating to infection control, including special reference to cleanliness.

Commission for Health Improvement

20. Mr. Casale: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the role of the Commission for Health Improvement. [119073]

Mr. Denham: The Commission will provide independent scrutiny of local National Health Service systems to assure and improve clinical quality; provide an expert resource to ensure rapid action is taken to address serious or persistent problems that have not responded to local efforts, and monitor NHS progress in tackling variations in standards of services.

Health Spending

21. Sir Sydney Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what his policy is in respect of the proportion of gross domestic product that should be spent on health. [119075]

Mr. Denham: In his recent Budget statement, the Chancellor announced the largest ever increase in funding for the National Health Service in England. Over this year and the next three, NHS Expenditure will grow on average by 6.3 per cent. a year over and above inflation. This is nearly twice the historic rate of growth.

Based on our latest projections total United Kingdom healthcare expenditure will reach around 7.6 per cent. of Gross Domestic Product by 2003–04.

Harefield Hospital, Middlesex

23. Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many letters his Department has received about the proposed closure of Harefield hospital, Middlesex. [119077]

Mr. Denham: Between 14 February and 18 April 2000 the Department of Health received a total of 54 letters about the proposals for the future of Harefield hospital.

Community Hospitals

25. Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which community hospitals have closed since May 1996, and how many beds have been lost as a result; and if he will make a statement. [119079]

Mr. Denham: The information requested is not available centrally.

Assertive Outreach Teams

26. Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many assertive outreach teams have been established since May 1997. [119080]

Mr. Hutton: Information about assertive outreach teams was first collected in 1998–99. Sixty-six teams were in existence by March 1999. Data for the year ending March 2000 have not yet been finalised but health authority plans indicated that a further 57 teams were to be established in 1999–2000.

In the National Priorities guidance for 2000–01 we have set a target for a further 50 teams to be established bringing the total to over 170 teams.

Local Authority Adoption Services

28. Mr. Colman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to reduce variations in the performance of local authorities in providing adoption services. [119082]

30. Mrs. Ann Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to reduce variations in the performance of local authorities in providing adoption services. [119084]

Mr. Hutton: We have already put in place the Quality Protects programme to transform the performance of local authority children's services. This includes investing in improved adoption services, in support of our aim of making maximum use of adoption with minimum delay. In addition, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is, with ministerial colleagues, conducting a review of adoption policy, looking at how to improve all aspects of the service.

NHS Trusts (Board Appointments)

29. Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the timetable is for reviewing the way in which board members of NHS trusts are appointed. [119083]

Ms Stuart: I am looking carefully at the best way to implement the new procedures and I hope to have a more detailed timetable in the next few months.

Waiting Lists (Northamptonshire)

31. Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on current hospital waiting lists in Northamptonshire. [119085]

Mr. Denham: At the end of February 2000, the total number of patients on hospital waiting lists in Northamptonshire (inpatient and day case admissions) was 13,503—a 20 per cent. reduction from the total in April 1998.

Hospital Beds (Worcestershire)

32. Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many hospital beds will be available in Worcestershire after the current hospital reorganisation; [119086]

(2) how many hospital beds he estimates will be available in Worcestershire following hospital reorganisation there. [109844]

Yvette Cooper: The important issue for the health service in Worcestershire is the number of patients who need to be treated and the appropriateness of their care. In line with this, the current estimate is that following hospital reorganisation there will be approximately 1,400 acute and community based beds available across Worcestershire. In addition, there will be more High Dependency Unit and Intensive Care Unit beds in the new acute hospital for Worcester owing to the investment the Government has made to modernise services in Worcestershire.

The report of the Government's National Beds Inquiry, set up to review assumptions about the demand for inpatient care and the implications for hospital bed numbers, was published for consultation on 10 February 2000. Consultation will focus on how health services, and specifically hospital beds, should be developed over the next 10- 20 years.

The National Beds Inquiry consultation will enable the Government to get the right number of the right sort of beds in the right places.

Community Health Provision

33. Mr. Pond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures he proposes to improve community health provision. [119087]

Mr. Hutton: We have already introduced primary care groups and primary care trusts to provide more integrated services and to ensure local decisions about community healthcare services are led by local clinicians. We have introduced new flexibilities through the Health Act 1999 to enable better partnership working between the National Health Service and local councils. And we are developing a new tier of intermediate care services to build effective bridges between home and hospital.

Primary Care

34. Liz Blackman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he is taking to deliver more services in primary care settings. [119088]

39. Ms Perham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he is taking to deliver more services in primary care settings. [119093]

Mr. Denham: Our aim is that, in time, all patients will be able to access expanded primary care services. Primary care groups and, particularly, primary care trusts have a key role in developing such services and making them more convenient, faster and responsive. The additional health resources, which the Chancellor announced in the Budget Statement, offer the opportunity to begin to deliver this aim sooner. We intend to work with the professions and others to grasp that opportunity. Accordingly, improved access to services is one of the main themes of the work of the modernisation action Teams, which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State launched on 12 April.

Domiciliary Care Agencies

35. Mr. Dobbin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on his plans to regulate and inspect domiciliary care agencies. [119089]

Mr. Hutton: We are committed to introducing a regulatory framework for home care services, and proposals for this are included in the Care Standards Bill, which was recently introduced in this House.

All domiciliary care agencies will be required to register, if they provide personal care services, and be inspected annually by the National Care Standards Commission. This will not apply to those supplying solely domestic services, which do not involve personal care, nor to those who provide personal care single-handed.

A core steering group and a wider reference group have developed draft national minimum standards and a user forum was held in January 2000. A consultation version of the proposed regulations and standards should be published later this year.

National Institute for Clinical Excellence

36. Mr. Burgon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the work of the National Institute for Clinical Excellence. [119090]

Mr. Denham: The National Institute for Clinical Excellence announced its work programme in November 1999. NICE has an agreed work programme of appraisals, clinical guidelines, clinical audits, and GP referral protocols. So far NICE has completed one fast-track appraisal, on the flu drug Relenza, and full appraisals on wisdom teeth and hip prostheses. We are expecting shortly the results of its appraisals on coronary artery stents and taxanes.

Waiting Lists (Consultants)

37. Mr. Ruffley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients are waiting for a first appointment with a consultant. [119091]

Mr. Denham: The Department has never collected data on the total number of people waiting for a first appointment with a consultant. The number of people waiting more than 13 weeks after referral by their general practitioner for a first outpatient appointment fell by 16,000 (3.2 per cent.) between September 1999 and December 1999 to 496,000.

NHS-prescribed Drugs (Access)

38. Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to remove regional variations in access to NHS-prescribed drugs. [119092]

Ms Stuart: We recognise and will tackle unacceptable variations in access to care and treatment. That is why we have set up the National Institute for Clinical Excellence (NICE). NICE will reduce post-code variations by issuing authoritative national guidance based on evidence of the clinical and cost-effectiveness of treatments.

NHS Dentistry

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he intends to publish his Green Paper on NHS dentistry. [119062]

Mr. Hutton: We intend to publish our proposals for modernising National Health Service dentistry this summer, in conjunction with the National Plan for the new NHS.

NHS Treatment (Access)

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he is taking to deal with regional variations in access to NHS treatment. [119069]

Mr. Denham: We are setting standards through the National Institute for Clinical Excellence and the National Service Framework programme; ensuring local delivery through clinical governance; and monitoring delivery via performance assessment framework, the Commission for Health Improvement and a national patient surveys programme. I will be working with relevant parties, utilising the record increases in National Health Service funding announced in the Budget, to improve NHS performance.

Health Statistics

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to collate comprehensive health statistics on a constituency basis. [119078]

Mr. Denham: We have no plans to develop comprehensive data on a constituency basis. For many sets of health data an analysis by constituency is not possible; sub-national analysis reflects either local or health authority responsibilities as appropriate. An extensive range of local health statistics is available and following consultation on the Social Exclusion Unit's report on 'Better Information' this may be further extended.

Long-term Care

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health on what date he will announce his complete response to the report of the royal commission on long-term care. [119081]

Mr. Hutton: I refer the hon. Member to the statement made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health on 2 December 1999, Official Report, columns 444–54.

Dystonia

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people have died of dystonia or dystonia-related complications in each of the last five years. [119833]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from John Kidgell to Mike Hancock, dated 2 May 2000:

The Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS) has been asked to reply to your recent question asking how many people have died of dystonia or dystonia-related complications in each of the last five years. I am replying in the Director's absence.

Information on the numbers of death certificates on which dystonia was mentioned and the number for which it was the underlying cause is given in the Table below.

Deaths with a mention of dystonia [1] occurring in 1994 to 1998, England and Wales

Year of death	Total mentions	Dystonia as underlying cause
1998	20	9

Genetic Data

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the compatibility of his Department's data matching in respect of fraud in the NHS with (a) Article 8 of the Human Rights Act 1998 and (b) medical confidentiality; what representations he has received on this subject; and if he will make a statement. [119523]

Mr. Denham: No such assessment has been made since the Department has not used data matching in respect of fraud.

Mental Health Services

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much money he has given (a) Bromley Health Authority and (b) Oxleas Dental Health Trust from the modernisation fund for use in mental health services in Bromley in (a) 1999–00, (b) 2000–01 and (c) 2001–02. [119466]

Mr. Hutton: The following funds have been allocated to Bromley Health Authority from the Modernisation fund for mental health services:

£35,000 for adult mental health (£15,000 for new atypical anti-psychotic medication and £20,000 for improved 24 hour access to services)

£56,000 for child and adolescent mental health

£25,000 for child and adolescent mental health

In addition to this, nationally £21.7 million of mental health modernisation fund money was allocated as part of unified allocations to all health authorities

Further allocations will be made during 2000–01.

Allocations have not been announced for 2001–02.

We do not make revenue allocations direct to National Health Service trusts. NHS trusts receive most of their income through service agreements with health authorities and their primary care groups.

Cerebral Palsy

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of Dysport in the treatment of cerebral palsy. [119467]

Ms Stuart: Dysport ("Clostridium botulinum" toxin, marketing authorisation holder Ipsen Limited) has been investigated over a number of years for use as an injection into spastic muscles of children with cerebral palsy, to relieve the muscle spasticity. Cerebral palsy can result in calf muscle spasticity, causing the foot to turn outwards and so interfering with gait and sometimes with the ability to walk. When used in the appropriate dose, injection of botulinum toxin into the calf muscles can improve gait and enable walking.

The Medicines Control Agency undertook a full assessment of reports of these studies, to evaluate the efficacy and safety of Dysport used in this way, in November 1999. On the basis of this assessment the licence for Dysport was varied to allow marketing for the indication 'Treatment of dynamic equinus foot deformity due to spasticity in paediatric cerebral palsy patients, two years of age or older, only in hospital specialist centres with appropriately trained personnel.'

Dynamic equinus foot deformity is the result of spasticity in the calf muscle.

Domestic Violence

Ms Moran: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to propose amendments to the Protection of Children Act 1999 to offer greater protection to children subject to child contact orders where there is a history of domestic violence. [119281]

Mr. Hutton: We have no plans to amend the Protection of Children Act 1999 in this way because it is aimed at a different set of issues; primarily at preventing those considered unsuitable to work with children from doing so.

Contact orders are granted under the Children Act 1989 and when there is a history of domestic violence, greater protection may be offered to children through the court specifying that contact takes place within a contact centre. Additionally, contact may take place in such centres on a supervised basis. An inter-departmental group is looking currently at the funding arrangements and provision of child contact centres as part of the Government's programme on domestic violence—documented in "Living Without Fear (1999)".

The operation of the Children Act is kept under close review and serious consideration is given to any changes that might provide greater protection to children with violent parents.

Hospital Food

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the cost of providing food to hospital patients, broken down by (a) staffing costs, (b) food costs and (c) other costs, in the last 12 months; and if he will make a statement. [119660]

Ms Stuart: Costs for provisions and kitchen and contract hotel services are collected from the trust financial returns and the latest firm information is for the 1998–99 financial year; this is shown in the table.

Information on staffing costs and food costs for providing food to hospital patients is not collected centrally.

Provisions and Kitchen[1]	257,633,466
Contract Hotel Services[2]	246,267,545

[2] Contract hotel services contains contract catering and laundry contracts.

Nursing Home Care

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to change the way in which nursing home care is financed; and if he will make a statement. [119661]

Mr. Hutton: We are considering all the Royal commission recommendations on the funding of long-term care in the context of the Government's Comprehensive Spending Review. Decisions will be announced later this year.

Aventis T25 Maize

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 5 April 2000, Official Report, column 502W, on Aventis T25 maize, what was the voluntary scheme under which the application was made; how the application was (a) processed and (b) determined; who were the animal feed experts who advised him on the safety of T25 GM maize for animal feed; and if he will place in the Library a copy of the application, together with copies of the correspondence relating to the animal feed application between himself, his advisers and the company. [119304]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 17 April 2000]: I am advised by the Food Standards Agency that the voluntary scheme related to novel food safety assessment and was operated by the Advisory Committee on Novel Foods and Processes (ACNFP). Although there was no equivalent scheme for novel animal feeds, the dossier of information was also considered by officials with expertise on animal feed matters. However, at this time, in the middle of 1996, the application from France under Council Directive 90/220/EEC for European Community marketing consent began to be considered. I am placing in the Library a copy of the advice from the European Commission's Scientific Committee on Plants. This explains, among other things, the animal feed issues considered prior to the granting of EC marketing consent for this crop. I am also placing in the Library copies of correspondence between the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the applicant company culminating in the then Parliamentary Secretary's letter which was based on advice from the ACNFP.

Air Ambulances

Mrs. Fiona Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations have been made to him regarding the central funding of emergency air ambulances, with particular reference to the one operating in Lincolnshire and Nottinghamshire. [119758]

Ms Stuart: While a number of representations have been made on the use of helicopters in the National Health Service, none have been made about the central funding of an air ambulance service in Lincolnshire and Nottinghamshire.

Community Nurses

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what recent discussions he has had with health trusts and local authorities concerning parking arrangements for community nurses; [119734]

(2) what recent discussions he has had with the Chancellor of the Exchequer regarding tax levels on lease cars used by community nurses; [119732]

(3) what discussions he has had with health trusts regarding mileage rates for community nurses; [119733]

(4) what plans he has to improve the lease car arrangements for NHS community nursing staff. [119731]

Ms Stuart: Mileage and travelling entitlements for National Health Service staff on national contracts are determined by an agreement of the General Whitley Council. A working group of the Council which includes representatives from trades unions and employers is reviewing existing provisions with the aim of recommending new arrangements which are fair to staff, meet service needs and reflect our wider environmental policies. The Inland Revenue have been consulted as part of this review.

As part of the consultation process for Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions' "Planning Policy Guidance 13", a number of NHS acute and community trusts were contacted to ascertain the likely implications of the proposed maximum car parking standards being applied to NHS hospitals.

"Fit for the Future?"

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to announce his conclusions based on the responses received to "Fit for the Future?"; and if he will make a statement. [119738]

Mr. Hutton: We intend to publish the finalised standards for care homes for older people later this year.

We are still considering the comments we received on "Fit for the Future?" before finalising the standards and the timetable for implementing them. However, we indicated our initial thinking in some key areas on 15 February 2000, Official Report, column 176WH.

We believe that some of the 260 proposals in "Fit for the Future?" may only have a marginal impact on the quality of care and it is highly unlikely that this many standards will be needed.

We do not accept that fixed ratios are the best means of specifying the number and qualifications of staff to be employed in a nursing home. For qualified nurses, numbers should relate to the assessed needs of residents at any one time. We are considering what models of assessment should be recognised by the National Care Standards Commission for this purpose and how nursing needs are defined so that nurse staffing levels can be set accurately and realistically.

We are looking very carefully at the proposed standards on the physical environment of care homes. These must take account of the high levels of physical frailty that many older residents in care homes have. In determining room size it is important to bear in mind aspects such as quality of life and safety for residents and staff. However, we do not intend to impose unreasonable physical standards on existing homes. Physical standards will be set at a level already being met by some providers and which other providers should be able to meet over time.

None of the standards will be introduced until at least 2002 when the Commission takes on its regulatory function. Some of the more challenging standards will not be implemented until some time after that. Providers will be given realistic timescales in which to meet any new standards.

Mental Health

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans there are for primary care groups to commission mental health services. [120032]

Mr. Denham: Health authorities are able to delegate to their primary care groups responsibility for commissioning most hospital and community health services, including mental health services. The range of services which each primary care group is responsible for commissioning is a matter for agreement between it and its health authority. As primary care groups develop, we expect them to take on responsibility for commissioning more services, including mental health.

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much of the planned increase in health spending in each of the next three years will be spent on mental health (a) in total and (b) in each region (i) in cash terms and (ii) as a percentage of the planned increase. [120031]

Mr. Hutton: Last year we announced our vision for mental health services, "Modernising Mental Health Services", with an additional £700 million of funding for health and social services during the comprehensive spending review period (1999–2000 to 2001–02). Since then, in the last budget, significant extra resources were made available to the NHS in each of the next four years. Decisions on the disposition of these resources have yet to be finalised.

It is therefore not possible to identify all of the additional resources that will be available for spend on mental health over the next four years.

Primary Care Group Board

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many Primary Care Group Board members are from the Professions Allied to Medicine. [120064]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 20 April 2000]: The composition of primary care groups governing boards reflects the need to ensure that general practitioners and nurses are in the driving seat for the shaping of local health care services. Professions Allied to Medicine may become co-opted members on the boards of local primary care groups but that information is not held centrally.

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 16 March 2000, Official Report, column 306W, for what reason the completion of equal opportunities forms by primary care group board members is not compulsory; and if he will make their completion compulsory. [120061]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 20 April 2000]: Committees of National Health Service organisations are not statutory bodies and therefore members of such committees are not subject to the same requirements to submit equal opportunity information as are board members of NHS organisations. A primary care group is a committee of a health authority

There are no plans to introduce compulsory equal opportunity forms for primary care group board members.

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many primary care group board members are nurses, midwives or health visitors from ethnic minority backgrounds. [120062]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 20 April 2000]: Based on the information provided by primary care groups last year, there are 12 primary care group board nurse, midwives or health visitor members from ethnic minority backgrounds. This information is currently being updated to reflect any changes in primary care groups and the creation of 17 primary care trusts from 1 April 2000.

Nurses and Health Visitors

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many (a) health visitors and (b) district nurses are aged 55 years old and over; and what proportion of the current workforce in each case they represent; [120006]

(2) how many (a) health visitors, (b) school nurses and (c) district nurses are currently in training; and what numbers in training are planned for 2001–02. [120060]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 20 April 2000]: The available information is shown in the tables. 2000–01 training figures are forecast and 2001–02 are not available.

Health Visitors (Ethnicity)

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the breakdown was by ethnic origin of health visitors employed in London by NHS trusts in each of the last four years. [120063]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 20 April 2000]: The data requested for each of the last four years for which information is available are given in the table:

Speech Therapists

Dr. Brand: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many speech therapists are employed by region; and how many vacancies there are for speech therapists. [120308]

Dr. Brand: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many speech therapists are employed by the NHS by region who have special training in communication aids. [120309]

Mr. Denham: The information requested is not available centrally.

Dr. Brand: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many speech therapists are in training. [120307]

Mr. Denham: There are currently 825 National Health Service funded speech and language therapists in training. This figure reflects those who have entered training since 1 September 1998 (the date on which the Department assumed responsibility for supporting new entrants on pre-registration speech and language therapy courses). Students who started their training prior to this date are funded under mainstream student support arrangements, which are a matter for the Department for Education and Employment.

Nurse Consultants

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the breakdown is by (a) gender and (b) ethnic origin of the newly-appointed nurse consultants. [120005]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 20 April 2000]: On 18 January approval was given for National Health Service bodies to establish 141 new nurse, midwife and health visitor consultant posts. The appointment process is under way but has not been completed. Data on the gender and ethnic origin of those appointed are not yet available.

Birth Certificates

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health for what purposes his Department requires a birth certificate to be furnished by (a) employees, (b) contractors, (c) those applying for employment and contracts and (d) other persons. [120318]

Ms Stuart: All those working for or on behalf of the Department may be called upon to produce a birth certificate, or other similar documentation, to prove their identity, eligibility under Civil Service nationality rules or age.

Working Time Directive

Mrs. Dean: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made in implementing the working time directive within the NHS. [120237]

Mr. Denham: Good progress is being made. Agreements have been reached with the General Whitley Council and the British Medical Association, to cover all National Health Service staff on nationally negotiated terms and conditions, other than junior doctors who are currently exempt from the working time regulations. The aim of these agreements is to make maximum use of the available flexibilities to allow local arrangements to be established so that the Directive can be implemented smoothly without adversely affecting service provision.

In addition, the NHS Executive issued supporting guidance in November 1998 (Health Service Circular 1998/204). Further advice was issued on 20 December 1999, to clarify certain legal aspects, and continued support and advice is available to help local managers resolve practical issues that arise.

We expect all NHS employers to be in a position to implement the regulations in their entirety shortly.

Children (Physical Punishment)

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he has taken to ensure public awareness of his document, entitled "The Physical Punishment of Children". [120186]

Mr. Hutton: We launched the consultation paper "Protecting Children, Supporting Parents: A Consultation Paper on the Physical Punishment of children" at a press conference on 18 January. It received extensive media coverage that day, and was widely reported in the media subsequently. The document was also made available on the DH website.

In addition, a number of children's organisations have run campaigns associated with the consultation throughout the consultation period and a number of publications with specialist and family interests have featured articles about the issues involved.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the Government will allow a longer time for public response to their consultation on the document, entitled "The Physical Punishment of Children". [120185]

Mr. Hutton: The consultation paper "Protecting Children, Supporting Parents: A Consultation Paper on the Physical Punishment of Children" was issued on 18 January and responses were asked for by 21 April.

While we are not proposing any formal extension to the consultation period we will take account of any responses received before the analysis of the responses is completed.

Residential and Nursing Homes

Mr. Curry: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what financial provision is made to local authorities in respect of residents who have placed themselves in residential or nursing homes and whose capital has declined to £16,000. [120073]

Mr. Hutton: Residential and nursing home care services are funded through the Revenue Support Grant. We do not make any specific financial provision in respect of residents who have placed themselves in residential or nursing homes and whose capital has declined to £16,000. At this point the local authority can undertake an assessment and, if necessary, step in to take over arrangements to ensure that the resident is not forced to use up capital below £16,000 beyond his assessed level.

Mr. Curry: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many residents in residential or nursing homes in each shire county in England, who placed themselves in such homes, are now funded by the local authority; and if he will estimate the cost to each local authority in the current financial year. [120075]

Mr. Hutton: Information in the form requested is not collected centrally. However, the number of residents supported by local authorities is at Table S3 in the Statistical Bulletin "Community Care Statistics 1999 Residential Personal Social Services for adults, England". Copies of this publication are available in the Library.

Aspartame

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what mechanisms are in place to monitor the number of people suffering an adverse reaction to aspartame. [120498]

Ms Stuart: The scientific data on aspartame are kept under continual review by scientific experts within the Food Standards Agency and, when necessary, independent expert advice is sought. In fact the safety of aspartame has been extensively reviewed by independent experts both in the United Kingdom and other European Member States and is considered safe to use for the general population. However, it is a legal requirement for all foods containing aspartame to be clearly labelled as containing a source of phenylalanine.

Correspondence

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he plans to reply to the letter from the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed of 4 January, concerning the length of time a constituent is waiting for treatment for angina. [120591]

Ms Stuart: My right hon. Friend will reply to the right hon. Member's letter as soon as possible.

NHS Appointments

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) on how many occasions since the publication of the Fritchie report on NHS appointments hon. Members have been asked to comment on shortlists for appointments to (a) health authorities, (b) NHS trusts and (c) primary care trusts; [120283]

(2) how many councillors of each party affiliation have been short-listed for appointments to (a) health authorities, (b) NHS trusts and (c) primary care trusts since the publication of the Fritchie report on NHS appointments. [120284]

Ms Stuart: Since 22 March when the Fritchie report was published, 56 submissions for 101 posts have been received by Ministers.

These included recommendations for 11 chairs and shortlists for non-executives which included 24 councillors.

The selection process at regional level had already been largely completed before 22 March so it is fair to assume that hon. Members were consulted on all 11 chair appointments in the usual way.

Drug Companies

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what checks he makes on the financial contributions made by drug companies to organisations that make representations to him. [120376]

Ms Stuart: It is neither practicable nor appropriate to check on the sources of income of every organisation that makes representations to the Department. In cases where the Department is contemplating financial support for an organisation, checks of this kind are made. It should be noted that the pharmaceutical industry offers support to organisations or their objectives in various ways other than direct financial contributions, and these must also be taken into account.

Nurses

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many qualified nurses left the profession within one year of completing their initial training in each of the last five years for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement on the impact of this loss of trained nurses on patient care. [120398]

Mr. Denham: This information is not collected centrally. We recognise the contribution nurses make to patient care and we are therefore committed to encouraging them to stay in the National Health Service once they have qualified. NHS employers are becoming more flexible with the working patterns they are offering, thus allowing nurses to balance their lives at work and home. The number of qualified nurses working in the NHS increased by over 5,500 between September 1998 and September 1999.

Health Authority Allocations

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for each health authority in England in rank order its allocation for 2000–01, including the expenditure announced on 28 March, expressed (a) per head of population, and (b) per household. [120274]

Mr. Denham: The average allocation per household in England for 2000–01 is £1,631. The number of households in each health authority is not available.

The allocation per weighted head of population in each health authority is given in the table.

All figures include the additional £660 million announced on 28 March.

NHS Savings

Mr. Lilley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the net savings made from replacing the NHS internal market by the arrangements introduced in April 1999. [120330]

Mr. Denham: Savings from replacing the National Health Service internal market have played a major part in ensuring that the Government are on course to achieve their commitment to save £1 billion from the cost of bureaucracy in the NHS. Savings have accrued through a series of measures including:

- abolishing the internal market and ending competition;
- introducing new primary care groups in place of general practitioner fundholding;
- replacing yearly contracts within the NHS with long-term agreements;
- abolishing the wasteful "extra-contractual referral" system
- pooling services and functions;
- merging NHS trusts to save at least £500,000 in each case.

These and other savings related to abolition of the NHS internal market and other cost reducing measures have contributed to an overall saving in management costs of £0.5 billion up to the end of March 2000.

Mr. Lilley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he has taken to (a) monitor and (b) measure the net savings arising from replacement of the NHS internal market. [120331]

Mr. Denham: The cost of managing the National Health Service has been monitored in a consistent way since 1995–96 and change in the quantum of management costs is used as the basic measure of savings accrued. No additional steps have been taken to monitor and measure the net savings arising specifically from replacement of the NHS internal market.

Monitoring of NHS management costs is carried out quarterly and annually for health authorities and primary care groups. Monitoring of management costs in NHS trusts is carried out annually.

Savings in total management costs are calculated annually from the information supplied by individual HAs and NHS trusts. Information to identify the level of savings accrued from mergers of NHS trusts is collected separately.

Electronic Health Records

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the progress made by (a) health authorities in Shropshire and (b) nationally to develop Electronic Health Records as set out in the report, "Information for Health". [120367]

Ms Stuart: The information strategy for the Modern NHS 1998–2005 "Information for Health", called for a number of demonstrator sites to be set up to explore the issues associated with the creation of electronic records. The setting up of these sites is a key component of supporting the delivery of electronic health records throughout the National Health Service.

I announced the names of the four Electronic Health Record (EHR) demonstrators on Monday 17 April during my visit to Burton hospitals, South Staffordshire. The sites chosen are Cornwall, South Staffordshire, County Durham and Tees. Work will commence once the deliverables have been agreed with each of the sites, on developing the concept of longitudinal care and 24-hour emergency access to clinical records. The sites will also consider emerging issues such as areas of personal rights to control over medical information (European context) and e-health agenda.

A larger number (up to 12) of Electronic Patient Records (EPR) demonstrators will start working in June on specific areas that have been identified as priorities by their local health community. These will include how information can be shared more effectively among members of the primary health care teams and between different organisations for the benefit of patient care. They will also closely support the concept of how information will actually support the delivery of the local Health Improvement Programme. The names of the successful sites will be announced in the next few weeks.

The demonstrator sites will be subject to national evaluation and will run for two years.

Shropshire local health community has developed a full Local Implementation Strategy for Information for Health. This was submitted to the Regional Office on 31 March 2000 and is currently being evaluated. It sets out a clear vision of the way in which the Shropshire local health community will achieve the targets set out in "Information for Health" in the period between 2000–05. The vision is supported by detailed investment proposals for the organisations involved in the planning and delivery of health and social care services to patients and the public in Shropshire.

Medical Laboratory Science Officers

Mr. Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the average amount of (a) paid and (b) unpaid time a medical laboratory science officer is expected to set aside for studying for a continuing professional development certificate. [120337]

Mr. Denham: The information requested is not collected centrally. Health Service Circular 1999/154, "Continuing Professional Development: Quality in The New NHS", supports National Health Service employers to develop locally managed arrangements for continuing professional development (CPD) to ensure that CPD programmes address the personal and career development needs of individuals and meet local service objectives and the needs of patients.

Mr. Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made in allowing medical laboratory science officers to join the Pay Review Body; and if he will make a statement. [120335]

Mr. Denham: Our proposals for modernising National Health Service pay, which were published in February 1999 in "Agenda for Change", include bringing some groups of highly qualified staff within the scope of the Nursing Pay Review Body, without changing its fundamentally professional character.

Initial discussions with NHS trade unions on pay modernisation resulted in a joint Framework of Principles and Agreed Statement on the Way Forward which was published on 8 October 1999. Para 7.2 of the joint Framework sets out the following starting point for more detailed discussions with trade unions on the qualifying criteria for groups to come with the scope of the NPRB:

> Professions with a minimum entry requirement of three years educational study (or equivalent) to diploma level or higher, in a health specific area (other than medicine or dentistry) and which are state registered and have a substantial majority of members employed in health care.
> Exceptions might be agreed for staff groups which met the majority but not all of these conditions.
> Staff groups which support professions added to the NPRB remit, and who have a direct connection with the transferred groups similar to that between nursing auxiliaries and registered nurses, would also need to be considered for transfer.

I am sure my hon. Friend will appreciate that, as this is part of continuing confidential discussions with NHS unions aimed at reaching agreement by summer 2000, I am unable to comment further at this stage.

Mr. Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what records are kept by his Department of death rates among medical laboratory science officers. [120338]

Mr. Denham: Information on death rates among medical laboratory science officers is not collected centrally, but may be held locally by individual National Health Service employers.

Health Workers

Mr. Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on (a) recruitment and (b) retention among health workers not covered by the Pay Review Body. [120334]

Mr. Denham: We recognise that National Health Service staff are the key to delivering its ambitious programme to modernise the service, and we are taking a number of steps which will help to address the issue of recruitment and retention of all NHS staff.

We are modernising services and modernising employment practice in the NHS: developing more supportive, flexible and family friendly working practices; extending and improving investment in lifelong learning and professional development; tackling violence and racism in the workplace; involving staff in the way services are delivered and in the changes and developments that affect their working lives. Pay is also being addressed.

In addition, we are developing the interactive service "NHS Careers" which will cover all NHS staff in due course.

Psychologists and Child Psychotherapists

Mr. Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the recruitment of clinical psychologists and child psychotherapists. [120328]

Mr. Denham: We recognise that National Health Service staff are the key to delivering its ambitious programme to modernise the Service, and we are taking a number of steps which will help to address the issue of recruitment and retention of clinical psychologists and child psychotherapists.

The recently published National Service Framework for mental health demands concerted local action through health improvement programmes, using local mechanisms for workforce planning, education and training, and continuing professional development and lifelong learning. The standards set out will require properly trained and supported additional staff across all groups to provide modern health care.

The Department has established an action team, chaired by Sue Hunt, an experienced mental health services chief executive, to deliver a nationally co-ordinated programme of support to help local health and social services authorities meet their complex workforce needs.

We are modernising services and modernising employment practice in the NHS: developing more supportive, flexible and family friendly working practices; extending and improving investment in lifelong learning and professional development; tackling violence and racism in the workplace; involving staff in the way services are delivered and in the changes and developments that affect their working lives. Pay is also being addressed.

In addition, we are developing the interactive service "NHS Careers" which will cover all NHS staff in due course.

GP Lists

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health for what reasons United Kingdom nationals are removed from their GP's list following periods of work abroad exceeding three months. [120377]

Ms Stuart: General practitioners' lists need to be kept up to date in order to reflect accurately the numbers of patients that they are responsible for. GPs have duties to provide continuity of care to their patients, and also to be able to visit them outside the surgery should the need arise. These responsibilities cannot be fulfilled if patients are resident abroad.

Appointment Waiting Times

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the average waiting time for patients from first referral until their first appointment with a consultant. [119074]

Mr. Denham: The average waiting time for patients from general practitioner referral to being seen by the consultant for their first appointment is seven weeks.

European Food Authority

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the proposed European Food Authority will be able to overrule the UK's Food Standards Agency. [120496]

Ms Stuart: No such formal role has been proposed. The relationship between the proposed European Authority and agencies in member states is not clearly defined in the Commission's communication. However, we expect any recommendations from the proposed Authority to be based on full consultation and careful analysis of the best available scientific information. The United Kingdom's Food Standards Agency will wish to be involved at an early stage and to participate closely in the work of the Authority.

Beef Imports

Mr. Todd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what tests are undertaken to ensure the safety of beef imported into the United Kingdom from countries where BSE infections have been notified. [117708]

Ms Quin: I have been asked to reply.

There are no tests available for the detection of BSE in meat. The three tests recently approved by the European Commission have been approved for the purposes of surveillance and are not suitable for testing imported beef.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Regulation of Investigatory Powers Bill

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his policy in respect of the use his Department, its agencies and public bodies will make of the powers relating to the authorised obtaining of communications data in Part I, Chapter II of the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Bill once the Bill is enacted. [119508]

Mr. Robin Cook: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary on 19 April 2000, Official Report, column 509W.

Online Services

Mr. Robert Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the services which (a) his Department and (b) the executive agencies responsible to his Department (i) provide on-line and (ii) expect to be deliverable on-line by 2002. [119441]

Mr. Hain: We are currently collecting data on our progress on delivering 25 per cent. of Government services electronically by 2002 to be included in the Cabinet Office's Spring 2000 report monitoring progress towards delivery of all Government services electronically by 2005. We currently provide a range of services electronically via our websites, including country Travel Advice notices, seven separate visa application forms, consular services and embassy contact details. Over 60 British diplomatic missions also offer a range of information and services via their own websites, linked from the main Foreign Office website. In the future, it is hoped to set up regional electronic 'contact centres' for British consular and visa services abroad.

"Your Britain, Your Europe"

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs for what reason the "Your Britain, Your Europe" campaign includes events commemorating UK participation in the Council of Europe; for what reason the questionnaire from the roadshow refers to Europe rather than specific European institutions; and what is his policy on clearly identifying EU institutions in this campaign. [119813]

Mr. Vaz: My engagement at the Council of Europe on 1 December had nothing to do with the "Your Britain, Your Europe" roadshow. The aim of the questionnaire was to pose general questions about Europe rather than focus on the specific institutions of the European Union.

During the "Your Britain, Your Europe" campaign I will want to cover all aspects of our involvement in the EU, including its institutions.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 22 March 2000, Official Report, column 601W, on the European Union, if he will list those companies and educational institutions to which the "Your Britain, Your Europe" leaflet was distributed; and if he will make a statement explaining the basis for their selection. [119838]

Mr. Vaz: We distributed 7,000 copies of the leaflet during the week to passers-by and those at the establishments we visited. It is impossible therefore to measure how many educational institutions and companies may have received copies of the leaflet. During the roadshow I called on the following schools and universities: Woodham Comprehensive School (County Durham), St. Joseph's Secondary School (Tyne and Wear), the University of Hull, De Montfort University (Leicester), Queen Elizabeth Hospital School (Bristol), Bath University, Kings Edward VI College (Nuneaton) and St. John's Primary School (Birmingham). I called on the following companies: Nissan Motor Manufacturing (UK, CORUS Engineering Steels and Kwik Strip Eco Solutions.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will estimate the proportion of (a) serving and (b) former (i) FCO and (ii) DFID Ministers' constituencies as part of the total number of constituencies visited by the first "Your Britain, Your Europe" tour; if he will list those constituencies so visited; and if he will make a statement. [119812]

Mr. Vaz: I visited 13 constituencies during the "Your Britain, Your Europe" roadshow. Two of these (Gateshead and Warrington, East, and Birmingham, Ladywood) are held by recent or current FCO and DFID Ministers. Information about former MPs in each constituency is not held centrally. As it is information about former Ministers, I suggest the hon. Member utilises the excellent facilities of the Oriel Room.

Fundamental Rights Charter

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress made regarding preparation of the Charter of Fundamental Rights, with special reference to its (a) contents (b) justiciability and (c) inclusion in the Treaty of Rome. [119816]

Mr. Vaz: The Charter Convention drafting body has now met seven times. There has been a first discussion of draft articles covering civil and political rights, citizens' rights (ie rights from the EU and EC Treaties), and some economic and social rights. Some civil and political rights have been discussed a second time. The next meeting on 27–28 April will include hearings of non-governmental organisations and continue the discussion of economic and social rights. The question of justiciability will depend upon the Charter's legal status which, together with inclusion in the Treaties, are beyond the Convention's mandate and will be considered by heads of government at the Nice European Council in December.

Gibraltar

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he proposes to take in response to the refusal of the Spanish authorities to allow Commonwealth Parliamentarians access to Malaga Airport from Gibraltar on Friday 14 April as a result of the closure of Gibraltar Airport owing to bad weather. [119808]

Mr. Vaz: Spain, like other EU member states, is obliged to impose visa regimes on nationals of countries listed on the EU Common Visa List. Beyond this, the visa policy of other member states is not a matter for the UK.

In response to the problems faced by six members of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association on 14 April, as a result of their lack of a Schengen visa, our Embassy in Madrid asked the Spanish Ministry of Foreign Affairs for assistance in ensuring that these CPA members could travel to Malaga to catch the later flight if that, too, was diverted. Once apprised of the problem, the Foreign Ministry took the necessary action with the Spanish regional authorities. In the event, their assistance was not needed as the flight was able to land in Gibraltar.

Parliamentary Answers (BNFL)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list each of the (a) oral and (b) written parliamentary answers Ministers in his Department have provided since May 1997, which were based on (a) information and (b) a draft provided by British Nuclear Fuels. [120045]

Mr. Hain: Internal advice and the source of such advice is not made public in line with exemption 2 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

DTI Staff (Secondment)

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many Department of Trade and Industry staff are currently on secondment to his Department; from which sections in the DTI they have come; and in which sections in his Department they are working. [119915]

Mr. Hain: There are 51 Department of Trade and Industry staff currently on loan to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

These staff were deployed from the following DTI Directorates: Consumer Affairs, Communications and Information Industries, Communications, Deregulation, Environment, Employee Relations, Invest in Britain Bureau, Management Best Practice, Nuclear Industries, Office of Science and Technology, Trade Policy, Warren Spring Laboratory, Export Control and Non-Proliferation and several regional Government Offices.

Since May 1999, British Trade International (a joint FCO/DTI Department) has had lead responsibility within Government for trade development and promotion on behalf of British business. This joint operation covers UK and overseas activity. Many of the DTI staff on loan to the FCO are deployed in British Trade International posts overseas. The majority of these staff took up their postings from what are now British Trade International UK operations.

Of the 51, there are currently 38 DTI staff in the following FCO and British Trade International posts overseas: Almaty, Amman, Bonn, Budapest, Buenos Aires, Cairo, Chicago, Dhaka, Gibraltar, Hanoi, The Hague, Houston, Johannesburg, Karachi, Kuwait, Lagos, Los Angeles, Moscow, Munich, New Delhi, Oslo, Ottawa, Paris, Peking, Seoul, Tokyo, UKMis Geneva, UKRep Brussels, Washington.

In London, the remaining 13 DTI staff are working in the following FCO departments: Aviation, Maritime, Science and Energy; Latin America and Caribbean; Near East and North Africa; North America; Resource Planning, and the Diplomatic Service Language Centre (undertaking full-time language training).

Iraqi Oil Sanction Breaches

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what assessment he has made of whether the Governments of (a) Iran, (b) Turkey and (c) Jordan have acted to stop the sale in breach of UN sanctions of Iraqi oil through their territories; [120041]

(2) if he will make a statement on his Department's assessment of the volume of oil sold by Iraq in violation of UN sanctions (a) during 1999 and (b) since the start of the current year; [120039]

(3) what assessment he has made of which countries Iraqi oil is being smuggled through in breach of UN sanctions. [120040]

Mr. Hain: We remain concerned at the large amount of Iraqi oil being smuggled through the Gulf and across Iraq's land borders in breach of UN sanctions. That oil should be funding food, medicine and other humanitarian relief for the Iraqi people through the UN programme, not going into the pockets of the regime and middlemen. We therefore regularly stress the need to crack down on sanctions-busting in contacts inside and outside the region, most recently with Turkey, Iran and the UAE. We ourselves remain committed to the Multinational Interception Force in the Gulf. I welcome Iran's recent action against a number of vessels containing smuggled Iraqi oil. We want Turkey to do more: last year we proposed that the trade across its borders be brought into the UN humanitarian programme. The Jordan/Iraq oil/trade protocol, which is acknowledged by the UN in recognition of the importance to Jordan of trade with Iraq, allows Jordan to import Iraqi oil at half the market price in exchange for Jordanian civilian goods. Excluding oil sold under this Jordanian protocol, we estimate that in 1999 Iraq sold approximately 3.2 million metric tonnes of oil in breach of sanctions; for this year we estimate the figure to be approximately 2.2 million metric tonnes.

European Union

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 10 April 2000, Official Report, column 77W, on the European Union, if he will list the responses referred to in his reply to question 118022; how many leaflets have yet to be distributed; what was the printing cost for the undistributed leaflets; and what analysis he has made of the cause of the small number of responses. [119863]

Mr. Vaz [holding answer 20 April 2000]: As we received only a small number of replies to the questionnaire, we did not keep a record of responses. We have distributed most of the leaflets and will distribute the remainder over the next few months. We have not drawn any conclusions about the small number of responses.

The Gambia

Mr. McDonnell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Government of The Gambia with regard to the recent deaths of demonstrators in pro-democracy marches. [120303]

Mr. Hain: The High Commissioner in Banjul called the Secretary of State for the Interior on 11 April to express our concern at the high number of casualties and urged the Government to ensure the security forces exercised maximum restraint, and not to fire on demonstrators. He stressed the need to maintain full respect for human rights.

On the initiative of the UK, the EU issued a declaration on 17 April seeking assurance from the Government of The Gambia that the incidents leading to these disturbances are dealt with through dialogue and in a peaceful and orderly manner. The President of The Gambia ordered a Commission of Inquiry later that same day.

The UK and the EU will continue to urge the Government of The Gambia to restrict the use of force; ensure persons detained as a result of these disturbances enjoy the protection of the law and that their rights are respected; and ensure that the inquiry is transparent, independent and free from political interference.

Israel

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Israeli Government concerning their obligations under the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child and their arrest and imprisonment of Palestinian children aged under 15 years. [119917]

Mr. Hain: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has made no representations to the Israeli Government about their obligations under the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child. The Red Cross have confirmed to our Embassy in Tel Aviv that Israel does not hold any children under the age of 15 in prison.

British Embassy Vehicles (Germany)

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the (a) cost, (b) make and (c) model was of the motor vehicles purchased for use by the British Embassy in Berlin since 1 May 1997. [120550]

Mr. Vaz: Neither the British Embassy in Berlin, nor (prior to September 1999) the British Embassy in Bonn, nor the British Embassy Berlin Office, have purchased any motor vehicles since 1 May 1997. All vehicles acquired in recent years have been leased.

EU Business

Mr. Ernie Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list (a) the forthcoming business in the Council of the European Union for May and (b) the major European Union events for the next six months. [120680]

India

Mr. McDonnell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Indian Government concerning the recent caste-related violence aimed at the Dalit community. [120300]

Mr. Hain: We deplore all forms of discrimination, including that based on caste. We are also concerned by incidents of caste-related violence. We and our High Commission in New Delhi continue to follow this issue closely.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he received about Kashmir prior to his visit to India. [120556]

Mr. Hain: We are aware of the concern of many people in the UK regarding the current situation in Kashmir. We hope that India and Pakistan can resume their dialogue and find a just and lasting solution to this issue.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he had in India about the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty. [120554]

Mr. Hain: We take every opportunity to urge India to sign and ratify the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty, including during the Foreign Secretary's visit to India last month.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about India's bid for a permanent seat on the UN Security Council. [120555]

Mr. Hain: The Government are committed to early enlargement of both the permanent and the non-permanent membership of the UN Security Council, including the creation of a new permanent seat for the Asian regional group. It would be for the Asian group to decide who would occupy any permanent seat allocated to them. India would clearly be a contender.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he had about defence exports while in India. [120553]

Mr. Hain: Defence exports were among a wide range of issues discussed during the Secretary of State's visit to India.

Sudan

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has received concerning violence near the Heglig oilfield north of Bentiu, southern Sudan; and if he will make a statement. [120266]

Mr. Hain: We continue to receive reports of fighting around and south of Bentiu in Unity State. We will maintain our efforts to push for a peace settlement which would end the suffering of those in the Sudan.

Export Controls (Macau)

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what strategic export controls the United Kingdom will apply to the Macau Special Administrative Region. [120681]

Mr. Battle: Following the return of Macau to Chinese sovereignty, we have reviewed our policy on the control of strategic exports to the Macau Special Administrative Region (MSAR).

We shall consider applications for licensing strategic exports to the MSAR on a case-by-case basis. We will not, however, issue licences for strategic exports to the MSAR for goods which we do not licence for export to mainland China. Our policy on strategic exports to mainland China is as set out by my late right hon. Friend, Derek Fatchett, on 3 June 1998, Official Report, columns 246–47W.

The Department of Trade and Industry will be removing Macau as a destination for Open General Licences which allow the export of Military List goods. Transhipment of goods on the Military List to the MSAR via the United Kingdom without a licence will also be prohibited. Schedule 3 of the Export of Goods (Control) Order (1994) will be amended accordingly.

HM Government's policy on strategic exports to Hong Kong remains as announced by my late right hon. Friend on 14 January 1998, Official Report, column 221W.

Iraq

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what recent representations he has received concerning the bombing of non-military targets in Iraq; [120610]

(2) what recent representations he has received concerning the bombing of military targets in Iraq; [120273]

(3) what plans he has to assess the effects of the continued bombing of Iraq; and if he will make a statement. [120611]

Mr. Hain: As I have told the House on many occasions, we are not conducting a bombing campaign against Iraq. UK and US aircraft continue to patrol the No Fly Zones, established in 1991 and 1992 in response to a situation of overwhelming humanitarian necessity, and in support of UN Security Council resolution 688 which called on Iraq to end its repression of the civilian population. They stop Saddam Hussein using his aircraft against his own people, as he did with such horrific consequences in the past. Since late 1998, Iraq has waged a systematic campaign to shoot our aircraft down. Direct threats against our aircrew have included missile attacks and heavy anti-aircraft fire. Our aircraft only take action when they are forced to do so to defend themselves. I am aware of claims, chiefly from the Iraqi Government, that our aircraft deliberately target civilians and civilian facilities. That is a lie. Only military targets clearly connected with the threat to our aircraft are targeted, and even then only when we are wholly satisfied that the associated risks are minimal. I am confident that our patrols prevent Saddam Hussein from adding yet more crimes to his appalling human rights record.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Sex Offenders

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 6 April

2000, Official Report, columns 599–600W, (i) how many prisoners released on the Home Detention Curfew scheme were released on the scheme before the end of the requisite period referred to in Section 34A(3) of the Criminal Justice Act 1991 as inserted by Section 99 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, (ii) if any of these prisoners have been recalled to prison to serve the remainder of the requisite period, (iii) if any of these prisoners committed a further offence (a) between the date of their release and the end of the requisite period and (b) subsequently while on the scheme, and (iv) if he will place in the Library the procedure laid down by Ministers for the release of sex offenders on the Home Detention Curfew scheme. [118806]

Mr. Boateng [holding answer 12 April 2000]: The available information shows that, since the Home Detention Curfew scheme commenced in January 1999, 12 prisoners have been released in error before their Home Detention Curfew eligibility date. This figure includes the sex offender subject to the Sex Offenders Act 1997 referred to in the reply given to the right hon. Member by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary on 6 April 2000, Official Report, columns 599–600W.

I deeply regret all of these errors, but the right hon. Member should note that they represent only 0.06 per cent. of the total of 18,736 prisoners who have been released on the scheme as of 31 March 2000.

All but one of these errors occurred before the introduction in October 1999 of the new improvements to the local inmate data system on which Home Detention Curfew eligibility and release dates are recorded by establishments. In five cases, the early releases were due to an error in manual calculation. In seven cases they were due to the prison's failure to amend the original eligibility date to take account of additional days awarded as a result of a prisoner breaching the prison disciplinary code.

Only one of these prisoners was recalled to prison to serve the remainder of the requisite period. The Prison Service has not been notified of any further offence committed by any of these prisoners either between the date of their release and the end of the requisite period or subsequently while on the Home Detention Curfew scheme.

The procedures for dealing with sex offenders subject to the Sex Offenders Act 1997 and other sex offenders are set out in paragraph 2.4 of the current Home Detention Curfew Prison Service Order 6700, issued in January 2000, a copy of which is available in the Library.

Kosovan Refugees

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received on reimbursing local authorities for the stay of Kosovan refugees. [119220]

Mrs. Roche: We have had a number of meetings and exchanges of correspondence with local authorities over the reimbursement of additional costs related to the care of refugees evacuated from Kosovo. Local authorities were consulted on the provisions of the Special Grant (the mechanism by which we make reimbursement payments) and all who put in their interim claims (for the period to 31 December 1999) by the due date have now been paid.

Extradition

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the legal causes upon which consent certificates were granted in extradition proceedings on account of (a) the extradited person making known an outstanding offence not known to the requesting authority, (b) the requesting authority discovering an offence which was not known to them at the time of the initial extradition request and (c) other reasons, in the past three years. [119715]

Mr. Straw: It is very rare to depart from the rule of specialty in respect of extradition proceedings. Formal certification to waive the rule is required only in relation to our extradition arrangements with Ireland. In the past three years I have signed four certificates. The details are as follows:

specialty was waived to allow an individual to be questioned in relation to a suspected murder following return for possession of offensive weapons. The Irish authorities had insufficient information to include it with the other offences listed in the request for the individual's return; in the same case, a second specialty consent certificate was signed to allow the individual concerned to be proceeded against for murder, intent to rob, entering as a trespasser with intent to steal and false imprisonment; in another case, specialty was waived to allow for an individual to be proceeded against for sex offences following return in respect of larceny and fraud-related offences. The Irish authorities had insufficient information to include it with the other offences listed in the request for the individual's return; and specialty was waived to allow an individual to be proceeded against for a number of summary offences, following his return for causing death by dangerous driving. The summonses for these lesser offences were transmitted at the same time as the warrant for the offences of causing death by dangerous driving however they were not served on the individual for operational reasons.

Figures relating to other countries are not recorded. It is estimated that there have been three or four specialty waivers in the past three years, but exact numbers, and the reasons for them, could be obtained only with disproportionate cost.

Sopley Camp, New Forest

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans his Department has to make use of Sopley Camp in New Forest District. [119720]

Mr. Straw [holding answer 19 April 2000]: My Department holds no legal interest in Sopley Camp in New Forest District and has no plans to acquire it.

Errol Flynn

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make available to the public in the Public Record Office the intelligence files relating to Errol Flynn; and if he will make a statement. [120038]

Mr. Straw: It is long-standing Government policy neither to confirm nor deny whether the security or intelligence agencies hold records on any individual.

The Security Service is systematically reviewing and where appropriate releasing historical records in accordance with the criteria agreed with the Public Records Office and endorsed by the Advisory Council. The Security Service has now reviewed and released all its files from its archive covering the period of the First World War. The second phase of the programme of release relates to the Security Service's records covering the Second World War. The third tranche of files from this period has just been made public. The Security Service will also be reviewing in due course its inter-war records in preparation for further releases. If there was a Security Service intelligence record relating to Errol Flynn it would be reviewed as part of this process.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, in a Written Answer on 12 February 1998, Official Report, column 324W, confirmed that the records of the Secret Intelligence Service are not released and set out the reasons for this.

Animal Experiments

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many tests were carried out using (a) animals and (b) mammals in each of the last five years; and what is the expected number for the next two years. [120292]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Table 1 of the annual Statistics of Scientific Procedures on Living Animals Great Britain records the number of scientific procedures by species of animal and primary purpose of the procedure. Figures are given for the number of procedures using birds, reptiles, amphibians, fish, cephalopods and octopus vulgaris as well as the number using mammals, listed by species. Overall figures for procedures using animals and mammals are as follows:

Year	Number
1997	2,635,969
1996	2,716,587
1995	2,709,631

Figures for procedures using mammals are:

Year	Number
1998	2,381,712
1997	2,380,287
1996	2,450,138

Figures for 1999 are in the process of being collated and are due to be published in July.

It is very difficult to project the number of animals to be used for the next two years. Numbers depend on the type of project licence applications that will be made to progress on current project licences. However, in general terms, there was a slight increase in the number of animals used during 1998 and it is possible that there could be another such increase in the 1999 figures. The main reason for this might be the increase in the use of genetically modified animals owing to current scientific advances. The downward trend in the use of conventional animals is expected to continue.

We will continue to ensure that animals are used only where fully justified—where there are no valid alternatives and where the benefits outweigh the costs to the animals involved.

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent research he has commissioned on carrying out experiments on animals for the purposes of research into cosmetics; and if he will make a statement. [120215]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Home Office itself does not commission scientific procedures involving the use of protected animals. In applying the regulatory regime set out by the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986, it assesses applications submitted.

In November 1997, we announced that no more animals would be used in this country for the testing of cosmetic products and ingredients, and we have not issued any new licences for such testing. We have no proposals to do so.

David Rocky Bennett

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to publish the police report to enable the inquest to be held into the death of David Rocky Bennett in the Norvic Clinic, Norwich. [120137]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Coroner has requested a police report to assist him in carrying out the inquest and any decisions about releasing the contents of such a report will be for him to make. The police investigation is still continuing.

Election Leaflets

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will consult the Direct Marketing Association on the form of words in the leaflet accompanying electoral application forms at the same time as he consults it on the draft regulations covering full and edited electoral registers. [120135]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: We are committed to full consultation on both documents. The draft regulations will appear on the Home Office website as soon as they are ready. When the regulations have been finalised but before they come into effect we will consult on the wording of any publicity leaflet.

Liquor Licensing

Miss Kirkbride: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to provide additional funding to local authorities in relation to licensing functions which at present are the responsibility of magistrates; and if he will make a statement. [120651]

Mr. Straw: The White Paper on the reform of the licensing laws, published on 10 April, makes clear that any new licensing regime should be resourced on the basis of full cost recovery from the fees and charges levied. We intend consulting closely with representatives of the local authorities about the resourcing of the system.

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on his plans to transfer the responsibility of liquor licensing from magistrates' licensing committees to local authorities. [120220]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The arguments for this change are set out in Chapter 11 of our White Paper, "Time For Reform", which was laid before Parliament on 10 April. We shall welcome and take into account comments on the White Paper in working up legislative proposals.

Efficiency Unit

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place in the Library the Cabinet Office Efficiency Unit Comprehensive Spending Review report submitted to the Home Office in 1998. [120275]

Mr. Straw: The Comprehensive Spending Review, which set out the Government's new public spending plans 1999–2000, was published in the White Paper 'Modern Public Services for Britain: Investing in Reform', in July 1998. This document is available in the Library.

Challenging targets were set by this document for a number of key services including the Police and the Fire Service. These included efficiency targets and annual efficiency plans. The Home Office is also committed to meeting a number of efficiency targets as set out in the Public Service Agreements, 'Public Services for the Future: Modernisation, Reform, Accountability—Comprehensive Spending Review: Public Service Agreements 1999–2002'. This document is currently available in the Library.

The Public Service Agreements and the Output and Performance Analysis for the Home Office are published in the annual Business Plan. The most recent Home Office Business Plan is also available in the Library.

Electronic Tagging

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer to the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe) of 17 April 2000, Official Report, columns 375–76W, if he will list the offences that are committed by prisoners who are at the lower end of the offending scale within the category of prisoners eligible for parole, and who will be released earlier than at present, under the provisions of the Criminal Justice and Court Services Bill, how many prisoners received sentences of four years or more for such offences in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement. [120293]

Mr. Straw: There are no provisions in the Criminal Justice and Court Services Bill which require any prisoner to be released earlier than at present. The Bill makes no changes to the date on which any prisoner becomes eligible for release.

The judgment as to whether a particular prisoner is regarded as being at the lower end of the offending scale within the category of prisoners eligible for parole cannot be determined simply by reference to the index offence. The details of the offence, the length of the sentence, the previous convictions of the prisoner, the impact on the victim (if any) and other factors will all be relevant. It is therefore not possible to list the offences that are committed by prisoners who are at the lower end of the offending scale, nor to list how many prisoners have received sentences of four years or more for such offences in each of the last five years.

Equally, it is not possible at this stage to predict which of these prisoners might be granted parole following implementation of the Criminal Justice and Court Services Bill who would not otherwise have received parole. The use of the new licence conditions will be subject to piloting before full implementation. Evaluation of the pilots will include consideration of the impact of the new licence conditions on discretionary release decisions taken by the Parole Board and by the Prison Service, on behalf of the Secretary of State.

Coroners Courts

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement regarding his review of the workings of coroners' courts. [120217]

Mr. Straw: The current Home Office review of death certification procedures includes consideration of a role for coroners in monitoring the proper procedures after death. The work of the review is to be made available later this year to Lord Laming's Inquiry into the issues arising from the trial of Dr. Shipman. There may consequently be a need in due course to review coroner arrangements more widely.

Asylum Seekers (Torbay)

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what extra provision he plans to make for accommodating asylum seekers in the Torbay Unitary Authority; how many asylum seekers he estimates will be placed in that area in the next 12 months; and if he will make a statement. [120342]

Mr. Straw: Since 3 April 2000, any local authority that signs a contract with the National Asylum Support Service (NASS) to provide accommodation for asylum seekers will submit an invoice for payment. The local authority will be reimbursed by the Home Office in accordance with the terms of the contract.

Although Torbay is considered a potential cluster area to accommodate destitute asylum seekers and their families, there are no immediate plans to disperse asylum seekers to Torbay. The National Asylum Support Service is unable to consider dispersal to a particular area until there is suitable accommodation available.

City Status

Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the timescale of the award of city status in the UK. [120225]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Thirty-nine applications have been received for the Millennium grant of city status from towns in the United Kingdom. Each application is being considered on its individual merits and in the light of all information submitted in its support. No date has yet been set for the announcement of the new city.

WALES

Regulation of Investigatory Powers Bill

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on his policy in respect of the use his Department, its agencies and public bodies will make of the powers relating to the authorised obtaining of communications data in Part I, Chapter II of the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Bill once the Bill is enacted. [119520]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary on 19 April 2000, Official Report, column 509W.

Knowledge-based Economy (Deeside)

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what recent discussions he has had with the First Secretary concerning the development of the knowledge-based economy in Deeside. [118186]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I have regular meetings with the First Secretary and discuss a wide range of issues including the knowledge economy.

The Government and the National Assembly for Wales recognise the importance of putting to productive commercial use more of the knowledge and technologies that lie within our universities and colleges. For example, Wales leads the rest of the UK in introducing the Colleges and Businesses in Partnership scheme, under which businesses undertake strategically important developments with the benefit of access to relevant academic expertise from the further education sector.

Artefacts

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to seek the return to Wales of historical Welsh artefacts that are located elsewhere. [120294]

Mr. Hanson: I have no plans at present to seek the return of historical Welsh artefacts that are located elsewhere. However I am pleased that the people of Wales will have the opportunity over the next few months to see the Pennal letter which is on loan to the Owain Glyndwr Exhibition at the National Library of Wales in Aberystwyth.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Drought (Kenya and Ethiopia)

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what estimate she has made of the number of people affected by drought in (a) Kenya and (b) Ethiopia. [118818]

Clare Short: The World Food Programme estimate that 1.6 million people in Kenya and eight million in Ethiopia may require emergency food assistance owing to drought.

Ethiopia

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what recent discussions she has had with her counterparts in European Union member states regarding the provision of food and other aid to Ethiopia; and if she will make a statement. [120216]

Clare Short: The EU is the largest single donor of food aid to Ethiopia—more than 400,000 metric tonnes (MT) has been pledged for this year; almost 47,000 MT has already been delivered to Djibouti. Britain contributes 17 per cent. of the cost of this food. My officials are in close contact with EU officials to monitor the delivery and distribution of EU food and non-food assistance in the current crisis.

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on how the food aid she is providing to Ethiopia will be distributed. [120213]

Clare Short: Our food aid is targeted at those populations most affected by recurrent rain failures, food insecurity, conflict and environmental degradation. This year we have provided over 22,000 metric tonnes of food aid bilaterally for vulnerable people in both the north and south of the country. This has been channelled through international non-governmental organisations who often work in partnership with the regional offices of the Disaster Prevention and Preparedness Commission.

Birth Certificates

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development for what purposes her Department requires a birth certificate to be furnished by (a) employees, (b) contractors, (c) those applying for employment and contracts and (d) other persons. [120316]

Clare Short: I refer my hon. Friend to the written answer given by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary to the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) on 6 May 1999, Official Report, column 463W.

CABINET OFFICE

Websites

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office which companies have placed advertisements on websites funded by her Department, agencies and non-departmental public bodies; how much revenue has been generated in each financial year since 1997 from such advertisements; and to what use the revenue raised has been put. [118844]

Mr. Stringer: No revenue has been received for advertising or sponsorship on the Cabinet Office website or that of its current agency—Government Car and Despatch Agency (GCDA); or on that of the Central Office of Information (COI). The Cabinet Office has no executive NDPBs and the figures for its NDPBs are included in the Department's return. The Cabinet Office does not take advertising on its departmental website (www.cabinet-office.gov.uk) and currently has no plans to do so.

Birth Certificates

Mr. Caton: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office for what purposes her Department requires a birth certificate to be furnished by (a) employees, (b) contractors, (c) those applying for employment and contracts and (d) other persons. [120323]

Mr. Stringer: A birth certificate or similar documentary evidence may be required to be furnished by any of the above for one or more of the following reasons:

proof of identity;

proof of eligibility under the Civil Service nationality rules;

proof of age.

Departmental Running Costs

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what meetings she has had with ministerial colleagues to discuss the increase in the overall running costs of Government Departments. [119955]

Marjorie Mowlam: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 20 April 2000, Official Report, column 638W.

Anti-drugs Strategy

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what progress the Government are making on their targets for reducing drug abuse by young people. [119975]

Mr. Ian McCartney: Young people are the main focus of the Government's anti-drug strategy. One of our key objectives is to reduce the incidence of drug misuse among the under-25s in order that they can achieve their full potential in society. The Cabinet Office, through the UK Anti Drugs Co-ordination Unit, is working with the relevant Government Departments to ensure that young people receive the help and advice they need to resist drug misuse.

For example, £7.5 million from the Standards Fund is spent each year on drugs education in primary and secondary schools and new DfEE guidance on effective drugs education was published in November 1998. Almost nine out of 10 secondary schools now have anti-drugs policies in place. In April 1999 the Drugs Prevention Advisory Service was created to provide expert advice and support to Drug Action teams and in November 1999 the Drugs Prevention Board was established to help co-ordinate prevention work at a national level. In March a new joint initiative between UKADCU, Sport England and the Youth Justice Board was announced, using money seized from convicted drug dealers and traffickers to fund projects which aim to prevent vulnerable young people from becoming involved in drugs and crime.

Progress against the targets will be measured through the British Crime Survey (16 to 24-year-olds) and the Office for National Statistics schools survey.

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what progress is being made by the Government in establishing a baseline figure from which progress in meeting its targets on reducing drug abuse among young people can be measured. [119958]

Mr. Ian McCartney: Baseline figures for the number of young people using drugs will be taken from the British Crime Survey and the new national survey of drug use among young teenagers, which started in September 1999. Baseline figures will be published in the UK Anti-Drug Co-ordinator's annual report in the summer.

Monitoring Unit

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what the cost of the Government Information and Communications Service Media Monitoring Unit was in 1999–2000. [120013]

Mr. Stringer: £535,000, subject to final reconciliation of outstanding invoices. These costs are recovered from a large number of Departments out of their existing funds. The Cabinet Office contribution is £25,000.

Rural Banking and Postal Services

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what representations she has received in relation to her role as Chair of the Ministerial Group on Rural Affairs concerning the loss of banking and postal services in rural areas. [119981]

Marjorie Mowlam: On the issue of banking I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary on 20 March 2000, Official Report, column 445W. I have received a number of representations, which I have discussed with ministerial colleagues as appropriate.

Centre for Management and Policy Studies

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what the cost or net revenue of the International Consultancy Group within the Centre for Management and Policy Studies is planned to be in the current financial year. [120023]

Mr. Stringer: In the financial year 2000–01, the International Consultancy Group (ICG) plans to generate a revenue of £2,300,000. The direct cost of the ICG for the same year is planned to be £1,961,000. The contribution to the costs of the Centre for Management and Policy Studies by the ICG will therefore be £339,000.

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will make a statement on the role of the International Consultancy Group within the Centre for Management and Policy Studies. [120022]

Mr. Stringer: The International Consultancy Group (ICG) was established in 1996 to co-ordinate the Civil Service College's developing portfolio of international public service assignments. The current role of ICG, now within the Centre for Management and Policy Studies (CMPS), is to work internationally to help create sustainable capacity for the modernisation of public administration.

ICG's current priorities include the need to develop the skills and capacities of senior civil services in Accession States as they negotiate with and join the European Union; and technical assistance to emerging democracies and democracies in transition as they seek to strengthen central co-ordination and service delivery in public administration.

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will make a statement on the work of the Centre for Management and Policy Studies. [119935]

Mr. Stringer: The Centre for Management and Policy Studies (CMPS), which was established in June 1999 and incorporates the Civil Service College, is integral to the process of modernising government. The CMPS works to ensure that the Civil Service is cultivating the right skills, culture and approaches to perform its task; to ensure that policy makers across government have access to the best research, evidence and international experience; and to help government to learn better from existing policies.

Examples of recent CMPS activity include programmes of joint seminars for Ministers and officials; developing a Resource Centre to support policy making, through the use of evidence and research; and comprehensive programmes of training reflecting all aspects of the Modernising Government agenda delivered by the Civil Service College.

Departmental Targets

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will (a) list the targets set by her Department and (b) make a statement on her Department's work to meet the targets. [119951]

Mr. Stringer: The targets set for my Department are all listed in the publication "Public Service Agreements 1999–2002" (CM 4181) which is available in the Library.

The work carried out by my Department to meet these targets during 1999–2000 is described in Chapter 2 of the Cabinet Office's annual report to Parliament "The Government's Expenditure Plans 2000–01 to 2001–02" (CM 4618) which was laid before Parliament on 10 April 2000. This report also contains summary information of the performance of COI and my Department's only agency, the Government Car and Despatch Agency (GCDA).

Full details of performance targets for COI, and its progress against them, can be found in COI's annual reports. The last report was published in July 1999 by the Stationery Office (ISBN: 0–10–273199–3).

Similarly, full details of performance targets for GCDA, and its progress against these targets, can be found in GCDA's annual reports. The last report was also published in July 1999 by the Stationery Office (ISBN: 0–10–280899–6).

Accommodation

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what the objectives are of the Cabinet Office new accommodation project. [120026]

Mr. Stringer: The objective of the new accommodation project is to accommodate the great majority of Cabinet Office staff in 70 Whitehall and one other central London building. The inter-connected Admiralty Arch, Ripley Building and Kirkland House will thus become the Department's second London home. Cabinet Office staff are currently accommodated in a number of central London buildings, some of which are on leases nearing expiry.

The project is an integral part of Sir Richard Wilson's review of the Cabinet Office announced by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 28 July 1998. As well as providing modern office accommodation, the project also brings into beneficial use three Government-owned buildings (two of which are Grade 1 listed) which had become empty and were in danger of falling into disrepair.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what proportion of Cabinet Office Staff at Grade 7 and above are (a) women, (b) from ethnic minorities and (c) disabled. [120027]

Mr. Stringer: The proportion of Cabinet Office staff at Grade 7 and above who are (a) women is 29 per cent., (b) from ethnic minorities is 2.06 per cent and (c) disabled is 0.3 per cent. Information on whether staff are from an ethnic minority background or are disabled is collected on a voluntary basis.

"Modernising Government"

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will publish the departmental action plans for corporate human resource systems intended to follow up the "Modernising Government" White Paper. [120007]

Mr. Ian McCartney: The "Modernising Government" White Paper does not mention departmental action plans for corporate human resource systems.

The White Paper noted that the Government would publish a substantial progress report on modernising the Civil Service later in the year. Sir Richard Wilson's report to the Prime Minister on Civil Service Reform was then published on 15 December 1999.

A progress report covering the whole Civil Service Reform programme will be published in autumn 2000.

Advertising

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how much money was spent on advertising by the Cabinet Office in (a) 1995–96, (b) 1996–97, (c) 1997–98, (d) 1998–99 and (e) 1999–2000. [119974]

Mr. Stringer: The Cabinet Office, including its Agencies, spending on advertising over those years is as follows: (a) £114,145 (b) £222,714 (c) £143,870 (d) £138,400 (e) £262,237.

Expenditure for 1999–2000 does not include advertising by Cabinet Office/Action 2000 on co-ordinating the Millennium Bug Information programmes.

Ministerial Group on Rural Affairs

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will list the meetings she has had in pursuance of her role as Chair of the Ministerial Group on Rural Affairs. [119964]

Marjorie Mowlam: Rural issues are discussed during a great many of the meetings I have, including meetings of the Cabinet Committee on Rural Affairs (MISC 8), meetings with national organisations, such as the Council for the Preservation of Rural England and the Countryside Agency, meetings with officials, and meetings with individuals and local organisations in the course of visits.

Civil Service

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will list the additional functions to be carried out consequent upon the planned increase in Civil Service staff in her Department between 1999–2000 and 2000–01. [120012]

Mr. Stringer: The planned average manpower figures for my Department and Agencies are detailed in table 6.4 (page 90) of the Cabinet Office's annual report to Parliament (The Government's Expenditure Plans 2000–01 to 2001–02) (CM 4618) which was laid before Parliament on 10 April 2000.

Between the years 1999–2000 and 2000–01 these show the following planned changes to be:

	1999–2000	2000–01	Change	Percentage
Cabinet Office	1,401	1,457	56	4.0
Security Facilities Division	426	136	−290	−68.1
Centre for Management and Policy Studies	240	284	44	18.3
Government Car and Despatch Agency	305	307	2	0.7
Total	2,372	2,184	−188	−7.9
Central Office of Information	361	400	39	10.8

The table in the annual report also included information on the Agencies that transferred to the new Office for Government Commerce (HM Treasury) on 1 April.

The reasons for the planned 4 per cent. increase in manpower in the central groups of the Cabinet Office, include:

The establishment of the new Office of the e-Envoy to co-ordinate the Government in leading the UK in its drive to be the best place in the world for e-commerce.

The development of the Regulatory Reform Bill which was announced in the Queen's Speech and published on 18 April 2000.

The need to find ways to reduce the regulatory burden on the public sector. Four key areas have been identified, Criminal Justice, Health (GPs), Education (Schools) and local authorities.

A small additional resource to drive through the Civil Service Reform programme—in particular, a new Mobility Unit to broker interdepartmental moves. The new Senior Adviser on Diversity and Equal Opportunities. And support to the new House of Lords Appointments Commission.

The development of excellence in public sector websites by developing and implementing the Government Website Guidelines under the E-Government Strategy. Including the development and management of the Citizen Portal programme.

Additional policy development work arising from the publication of the E-government strategy and the need to embed its provisions and the development of e-business strategies across government and the wider public sector.

Specialist project management teams to supervise a series of cross-cutting technical projects to be funded by the Capital Modernisation Fund. These projects include the development of gateway and portal facilities to support UK Online and to develop the range of services available and wider interoperability on the Government Secure Intranet business solutions, handling public inquiries and correspondence, IT services, etc.)

More effective support to Cabinet Committee business, and to continue the Cabinet Committee business, and to continue the Cabinet Secretariat's traditional role of supporting policy development by Cabinet and Cabinet Committees.

The reduction of 68 per cent. in the planned manpower at the Security Facilities Division is due to the continued run down of this former Agency. The major reduction is due to the contracting out of the Custody Services, the transfer of Assessment and Development Staff to the Home Office and a reduction in Special Services Group (Operations).

The Centre for Management and Policy Studies (CMPS) was formed in 1999–2000 and its manpower was only planned to be fully established with the merger of the Civil Service College from 1 April 2000. The new functions provided by CMPS from this year will include:

Ministers' Programmes: the design and delivery of induction and development opportunities for Ministers.

Corporate Development Strategy: the creation and implementation of a strategy for the development of senior civil servants, with an expanded range of programmes.

Departmental Peer Review: reviews of Government departments by external teams of departments.

Policy Seminars: the design and delivery of joint seminars with Ministers and senior officials to examine policy issues.

Policy Evaluation: the identification and promotion of best practice in the construction, development and implementation of policy.

Policy Research: the design and production of 'Knowledge Pools', drawing together the evidence on which policy is based from diverse sources.

Policy Resource Centre: delivering an entry point to a government wide knowledge centre drawing upon departmental resources.

Knowledge Network project; the design and delivery of a system to deliver fast, accurate flows of knowledge, facts and figures on policy across government.

The number of staff are increasing at the Central Office of Information due to significant increases in the volume of work. The numbers of staff reflect the increased business levels over the last two years. Manpower resources have been trailing behind this increase and the forecast for 2000–01 therefore assumes a similar level of increased business.

Ministerial Red Boxes

Mr. Gray: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office when she last reviewed the guidance concerning the security of ministerial red boxes on public transport. [120748]

Mr. Stringer: Ministers are given security briefings which include guidance on the secure handling of all sensitive Government information. All guidance is kept under continuous review.

Hotel and Catering Industry

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office when Lord Haskins' report on regulations in the hotel and catering industry will be published. [120379]

Mr. Stringer: The Better Regulation Task Force's report on regulation and enforcement in the hotel and restaurant sector will be published in June.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

School Spending (Cumbria)

Dr. Jack Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what estimate he has made of spending per pupil in real terms in (a) primary schools and (b) secondary schools in Cumbria in (i) 1997–98, (ii) 1998–99 and (iii) 1999–2000; and if he will make a statement. [115068]

Ms Estelle Morris [holding answer 20 March 2000]: The following table shows the education standard spending assessment (SSA) per primary and secondary pupil and the DfEE special and specific grant allocations per primary and secondary pupil for the years 1997–98 to 2000–01 for Cumbria Local Education Authority. The special and specific grant totals include the money for schools announced in the Budget on 21 March.

	Standard Spending Assessment		Special and Specific Grants per primary pupil	per secondary pupil	per primary pupil	per secondary pupil
1997–98	2,022	2,644	36	29
1998–99	2,133	2,774	84	69
1999–2000	2,255	2,887	143	98
2000–01	2,357	3,032	275	209

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much his Department spent directly or indirectly on asylum seekers in (a) 1995, (b) 1996, (c) 1997, (d) 1998 and (e) 1999; and what estimate has been made of expenditure in the year 2000. [119486]

Ms Hodge [holding answer 17 April 2000]: The Home Office will be responding to this Question on behalf of Government as a whole, using information that we have provided to them.

Schools Funding

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the separate ringfenced schemes for funding schools directly from his Department. [119744]

Ms Estelle Morris: Most ringfenced funding, including the Standards Fund and funding for capital work, is paid via Local Education Authorities, not directly to individual maintained schools. Non-maintained special schools and voluntary-aided schools do receive some capital funding direct from the Department. For 2000–2001, around 75 per cent. of the £1.6 billion expenditure supported through the Standards Fund must be devolved to schools. In addition, schools will receive a share of the £290 million funding increase announced in the Budget and of the £50 million for general support of school budgets. These additional amounts will be paid to Local Education Authorities but must be fully passed on to schools.

Special Educational Needs

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what the current average cost is of preparing a statement of special educational needs. [119323]

Jacqui Smith [holding answer 19 April 2000]: Information on the cost of preparing a statement of special educational needs is not collected centrally. The Code of Practice on the Identification and Assessment of Special Educational Needs sets out that LEAs must identify and make a statutory assessment of those children for whom they are responsible who have special educational needs and who may need a statement. However, LEAs and schools do not account separately for special educational provision, including specific information on preparation of statements. The differential between local practices means any estimated costs would be based on assumptions and cost apportionments.

St. Gregory's, Cheltenham

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he expects his Department to make a decision on the disposal of school property at St. Gregory's in Cheltenham. [120038]

Jacqui Smith: I am considering this case and expect to be able to make a decision shortly.

Age Diversity in Employment

Ms Perham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he plans to publish the preliminary report on monitoring the effectiveness of the Code of Practice on Age Diversity in Employment. [119844]

Ms Hodge: We will shortly be receiving the results from the second wave of research which was carried out earlier this year. We will be publishing the interim findings of the evaluation in early June.

Teenage Girls Report

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when the Women's Unit will publish its report on teenage girls. [120010]

Ms Jowell [holding answer 20 April 2000]: I refer the hon. Member to my answer of 10 April 2000, Official Report, column 41W.

Nursery Education

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to increase the funding of education for three-year-olds in areas of need outside the inner cities. [120122]

Ms Hodge: Between September 1999 and April 2001 we have allocated £140 million to provide an additional 83,000 free early education places for three-year-olds, on the basis of each Local Education Authority's position on the Government's Index of Local Deprivation. A further £250 million has been allocated for 2001–02 to take the total number of new free places created to 190,000 by March 2002.

The methodology that will be used to allocate these places in 2001–02 will be decided once we have had an opportunity to evaluate the progress of the scheme across all authorities this year. However, those authorities who have so far received low levels of funding are likely to see increases in their allocation in 2001–02.

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the availability of funding from his Department for three-year-olds in (a) the maintained and (b) the voluntary sectors. [120138]

Ms Hodge: The Government are making available grants of £390 million over three years (from September 1999-March 2002) to almost double the number of three-year-olds in free early education places. In 1999–2000, the first tranche of Local Education Authorities which benefited from £40 million of this new money funded over 80 per cent. of the new free places in the private, voluntary and independent sectors.

Prior to this new funding being available, as of January 1999, 37 per cent. of three-year-olds were receiving free early education in the maintained sector funded from each Local Education Authority's Standard Spending Assessment budget.

Children outside Mainstream Education

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how he intends to make further use of information and communication technologies in the education of children unable to attend mainstream schooling through (a) disability, (b) illness, (c) behavioural problems and (d) neglect. [120196]

Jacqui Smith: Information and communication technologies (ICT) can facilitate effective communication and give access to resources regardless of the learners' location and individual needs. The Government are committed to exploiting the benefits and advantages of ICT in developing learning in a range of settings, as described.

The developing National Grid for Learning (NGfL) has a specific remit to encourage the inclusion of all pupils—in particular, those with Special Educational Needs (SEN), the disadvantaged, and any children who, for whatever reason, are not being educated at school. Recent developments include the new Inclusion website which is currently focusing on SEN and provides teachers, parents and other professionals with a catalogue of on-line resources.

My Department encourages Local Education Authorities to use ICT in supporting sick children. We have also made £95,000 available in 1999–2000 to provide lap tops for hospital and home tuition services.

Using the Standards Fund, a number of LEAs are piloting innovative ICT projects to support inclusion and reduce exclusions and the incidence of difficult behaviour. We will be evaluating these projects and will aim to disseminate good and best practice arising from them.

The Department is sponsoring a pilot project (Notschoolnet) on the use of ICT to support groups of pupils excluded from school. The pilot includes the provision of ICT equipment and facilitators providing on-line support for students at home or other locations. We have also funded major trials of digital broadcast material, which have been taking place in schools and with independent learners over the last few months.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will consult internet companies about providing educational assistance for children unable to take part in mainstream education. [120199]

Jacqui Smith: The Government are investing over £1.7 billion in their information and communications technology (ICT). My Department and the British Educational Communications and Technology agency (BECTa) are in regular contact with all those involved in the provision of ICT education materials.

We have issued a challenge document, "Open for Learning, Open for Business", which calls for a national effort to develop content for the Grid under a framework offering access and education resources for both mainstream and special schools. On 10 April we held a major conference which focused on the ICT content (software) industry to discuss the way forward with companies who are linked to the National Grid for Learning.

New Deal for Schools

Mr. Hesford: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many schools will benefit from the New Deal for Schools in 2000–01. [120084]

Jacqui Smith: Over 6,000 schools will benefit from the £600 million of New Deal for Schools funding announced on 11 April. We would expect most of these schools to benefit in 2000–01.

Grant-maintained Schools

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many (a) teachers and (b) classroom support staff have been employed by (i) former grant-maintained primary schools and (ii) former grant-maintained secondary schools in each of the last five years. [120258]

Ms Estelle Morris: The available information on numbers of teaching staff and educational support staff in former grant-maintained primary and secondary schools is shown in the table.

The Department is currently collecting information on teaching and education support staff in maintained primary and secondary schools for January 2000. These data will be published in a statistical volume in September.

Education Spending (Stoke-on-Trent)

Mr. Stevenson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the (a) standard spending assessment and (b) total estimated spending per head in Stoke-on-Trent local education authority in each of the years 1998–99 and 1999–2000; and what estimate he has made of comparable figures for 2000–01. [120397]

Ms Estelle Morris: The table shows the total education standard spending assessment (SSA), the education standard spending assessment (SSA) per pupil and the DfEE special and specific grant allocations per pupil for the years requested for Stoke-on-Trent local education authority. The special and specific grant totals includes the money for schools announced in the Budget on 21 March.

	Total SSA (£ million)	SSA per pupil (£)	Special and specific grant per pupil (£)
1998–99	95.93	2,437	68

Ofsted Inspections

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what measures he has in place to reduce the stress to teachers caused by Ofsted inspections; and if he will make a statement; [120221]

(2) what complaints his Department has received in the last two years from (a) unions and (b) individuals about Ofsted inspections; what response has been made by Ofsted to these complaints; and what changes in inspection practices have been made as a result; [120222]

(3) what lessons have been learned by Ofsted regarding the suicide of Ms Pamela Relf; and if he will make a statement. [120223]

Ms Estelle Morris: These are matters relating to the responsibilities of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Schools, Chris Woodhead. I have asked him to write to my hon. Friend and to place a copy of his letter in the Library.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Abattoirs

Sir Peter Emery: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures he is taking to assist small and specialist abattoirs in Devon. [118501]

Ms Stuart: As responsibility for food safety and standards matters has now passed to the Food Standards Agency (FSA) which reports to Parliament through Health Ministers, I have been asked to reply.

I am advised by the Food Standards Agency that it recognises the difficulties faced by the meat industry, especially small businesses, as a result of increased veterinary supervision levels and the associated costs. Equally, it understands very well the importance of local slaughtering facilities and it is certainly not its intention to put out of business smaller operations, particularly those specialising in a high quality product.

A number of measures have been put in place to help small and medium sized abattoirs. These include the freezing of Meat Hygiene Service hourly rates in 1999–2000 at 1998–99 levels (worth £7 million) and restricting the increase in 2000–01 to no more than the rate of inflation (2.2 per cent.), and the deferment of charges for SRM controls for a further two years until 2002–03 at the earliest (worth £44 million). Following advice received from the European Commission, the Meat Hygiene Service is reviewing its levels of inspection in individual low throughput (permanently derogated) premises. In the meantime, no increases in veterinary supervision levels in such premises have been made since the Commission's advice was received last May, nor will there be any changes made until that review has been completed.

We have accepted, or are giving further consideration to, 32 of the 35 recommendations of the Meat Industry Red Tape Working Group and, as my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister confirmed at the agriculture summit on 30 March, the Government are pressing on urgently with their implementation. Steps are being taken to secure changes in the European Union meat hygiene and charging legislation in line with the Group's recommendations but this will inevitably take time to achieve. In the meantime, a small independent task force has been set up, as recommended by the Group, to explore all the issues surrounding a "capping" approach to meat hygiene inspection charges for low volume abattoirs. The task force, chaired by Colin Maclean, former Director-General of the Meat and Livestock Commission, held its first meeting on 6 April and is due to report by 31 May.

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has recently received concerning the future of small abattoirs; and what action he is taking to ensure their survival. [116251]

Ms Stuart: As responsibility for food safety and standards matters has now passed to the Food Standards Agency (FSA) which reports to Parliament through Health Ministers, I have been asked to reply.

Since publication of the Government's response to the report of the Meat Industry Red Tape Working Group, the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and, from 1 April, the Food Standards Agency, has received a number of representations from a wide variety of sources about the future of small abattoirs. The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food recently replied to an open letter from 136 organisations about the impact of meat inspection charges on small and medium sized abattoirs, copies of which are available in the Library.

I am advised that the Food Standards Agency recognises the difficulties faced by the meat industry, especially small businesses, as a result of increased veterinary supervision levels and the associated costs. We also understand the importance of local slaughtering facilities.

A number of measures have been put in place to help small and medium sized abattoirs. These include the freezing of Meat Hygiene Service (MHS) hourly rates in 1999–2000 at 1998–99 levels (worth £7 million) and restricting the increase in 2000–01 to 2.2 per cent., in line with the rate of inflation and the commitment made by us last year. Charges for enforcement of specified risk Material controls have been deferred until 2002–03 at the earliest (worth £22 million). Following advice received from the European Commission, the MHS is reviewing its levels of inspection in individual low throughput (permanently derogated) premises. No increases in veterinary supervision levels in such premises have been made since the Commission's advice was received last May. No changes will be made until that review has been completed.

In addition, we have adopted, or are giving further consideration to, 32 of the 35 recommendations of the Meat Industry Red Tape Working Group. We are pressing on with their implementation as was confirmed by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister at the agriculture summit on 30 March. Steps are being taken to secure changes in the European Union meat hygiene and charging legislation in line with the Group's recommendations and discussions are underway in Brussels. The Food Standards Agency has also acted on the Group's recommendation and has set up a small task force to explore all the issues surrounding a 'capping' approach to meat hygiene inspection charges for low volume abattoirs. Its membership and working arrangements were announced in a Food Standards Agency press release on 11 April, copies of which are available in the Library.

Mr. Luff: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food for what reason the "Action Plan for Farming", published on 30 March, contains no proposals to assist the re-establishment of abattoir facilities in areas that have lost such facilities; and if he will make a statement. [117697]

Ms Quin: Assistance for the re-establishment of abattoir facilities was not included in the "Action Plan for Farming" published on 30 March because the Government have already put in place a number of measures to help this sector.

Veterinary supervision levels in low throughput (permanently derogated) abattoirs have been frozen at May 1999 levels pending completion of a review of supervision levels in such plants following advice from the Commission (published by the Government in October 1999). The introduction of charges for cattle passports and MHS enforcement of SRM controls has been deferred until at least 2002–03 (worth £44m). Meat inspection charges for 1999–2000 were capped at 1998–99 levels (worth £7m) and will rise by only 2.2 per cent. in 2000–01, in line with the rate of inflation as previously announced by my right hon. Friend the Minister. As recommended by the Meat Industry Red Tape Working Group (the Pooley Report) a small task force has been set to urgently explore alternative ways of recovering the costs of inspection work, within the framework of Community law. This will report and make recommendations to the Food Standards Agency who now have responsibility for meat hygiene.

Beef

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will set a date for the lifting of the ban on over-thirty-month cattle entering the food chain where they are subject to full traceability. [118667]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 11 April 2000]: I have been asked to reply.

The ban on over-thirty-month cattle entering the food chain is one of a number of BSE controls to be reviewed by the Food Standards Agency (FSA). This was announced by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister at the agriculture summit on 30 March. The FSA has been asked to consider the controls to ensure that they adequately protect the consumer, and their proportionality to the assessed risk. The FSA will submit a published report to UK Health and Agriculture Ministers by the end of October or as soon as possible afterwards taking account of the report of the BSE Inquiry. Ministers will then consider whether there should be any change in the ban on over-thirty-month cattle entering the food chain in the light of the FSA's report.

Inverdale Gene

Mrs. Fiona Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the risks from the importation of the Inverdale Gene to the UK, with particular reference to its possible role in causing infertility [118199]

Ms Quin: No formal assessment has been made. The hazard of infertility associated with the Inverdale gene is well understood. It is for the sheep breeding industry to assess whether the benefits of introducing the gene into UK breeding flocks through the importation of semen or animals outweigh the risks of infertility.

Livestock Compensatory Allowances

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received on the question of modulation in relation to livestock compensatory allowances; and if he will make a statement. [118401]

Ms Quin: The only livestock compensatory allowances paid in the UK are paid under the Hill Livestock Compensatory Allowance Schemes. These are to be replaced by new schemes under the EC Rural Development Regulation. As such they would not be subject to modulation and I have received no representations on the issue.

Sheep Farming

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the effects on sheep farming of (a) the Groundwater Directive, (b) abattoir closures and (c) the costs of the proposed identification scheme. [118332]

Ms Quin: The information is as follows: (a) Under the Groundwater Regulations 1998, which implement the Groundwater Directive, sheep farmers wishing to dispose of any listed substance (including sheep dip containing such substances) to land will normally require a groundwater authorisation from the Environment Agency. Under the agriculture strategy package announced recently it is proposed to restrict charges to a single application fee (currently £92) for the first four-year period of an authorisation, rather than for farmers to have also to pay an annual charge. This will result in an estimated saving for sheep farmers of £428 at 1999 prices in respect of the annual charge.

(b) None. There remains considerable over-capacity in the mainstream sheep-slaughtering sector and as a result there is unlikely to be any measurable effect of abattoir closures on the majority of producers.

(c) We estimate that the initial cost of tagging all sheep in Great Britain will be a maximum of £12 million; in subsequent years this falls to £6 million. For around 80 per cent. of sheep holdings in Great Britain the cost of tags for the entire flock will be less than £200 in the first year.

Live Animal Exports

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which member states of the European Union have introduced legislation to give effect to the Live Transport Directive 95/29/EC. [118589]

Mr. Morley: Information made available by the European Commission, whose responsibility it is to ensure that EU legislation is implemented, indicates that all member states have implemented Council directive 95/29/EC amending directive 91/628/EC on the protection of animals during transport.

Lavender Industry

Mr. Brake: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on support for the UK lavender growing industry. [118590]

Ms Quin: The Ministry supports non-food crops through its Agri-Industrial Materials Branch disseminating information, organising events and supporting research and development, although no specific activity relating to lavender is currently taking place.

Organic Food

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent research he has carried out on the impact on biodiversity of (a) organic and (b) conventional farming methods. [118570]

Ms Quin: A number of comparative studies have been funded by the Ministry. A desk study was completed in 1998 which compared the effects on biodiversity of conventional, organic and integrated farming systems. This summarised the results of previous field-based research, and concluded that organic regimes showed an overall benefit for biodiversity at the farm level. A new field-based project started in 1999 to determine to what extent any biodiversity differences between organic and conventional farms are caused by differences in non-crop habitats.

Other recent research includes projects to assess the impact of conventional agriculture on farmland bird populations, the effects of pesticides on non-target species (including indirect effects on birds), the causes of changes on botanical diversity on farmland, and the causes of changes in brown hare populations. The Ministry is also co-funding the Countryside Survey 2000 project which focuses on an assessment of the extent of changes in botanical diversity on farmland.

Food Stores

Mr. Cox: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what foods and in what quantities were in storage within the European Union on 1 March. [118832]

Ms Quin: The following foods and quantities were in storage within the European Union on 1 March 2000.

	Amount (000 tonnes)
Beef	25
Wheat	4,106
Barley	5,021
Maize	59
Rice	495
Rye	3,184
Butter	57
Skimmed Milk Powder	157
Olive Oil	25
Wine	193

Research and Development

Mr. Breed: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was his Department's budget for Research and Development in (a) 1998–99 and (b) 1999–2000. [119007]

Ms Quin: The figures were (a) £139.8 million; and (b) £139.3 million.

Land Holding Statistics

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many landowners in England and Wales have land holdings in excess of (a) 25,000 acres, (b) 20,000 acres, (c) 15,000 acres and (d) 10,000 acres. [119038]

Ms Quin: This information is not available. MAFF holds information on the land area related to agricultural holdings.

Spongiform Encephalopathies

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of recent studies on maternal transmission (a) of the BSE infective agent in cattle and (b) of related infections in other mammalian species. [119035]

Ms Quin: MAFF have funded a large-scale experiment to assess whether embryos collected from cows in the late stages of BSE infection and then transplanted into TSE-free recipient cows from New Zealand, go on to develop BSE later in life. Offspring will be observed for seven years for the development of BSE. The study is due to end next year but so far none of the offspring have shown any signs of BSE. This provides experimental evidence to indicate that BSE is not transmitted to embryos by the maternal route.

Similar studies have been performed in sheep infected with scrapie but results have been difficult to interpret because of the complex genetic factors that influence scrapie susceptibility in sheep. Epidemiological work is ongoing to investigate the natural routes of transmission of scrapie, however, it is too early to make an assessment of the results obtained so far.

EU Farming Regulations

Mr. Breed: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent discussions he has had with his European counterparts on ensuring uniformity of farming regulations in the EU. [118943]

Ms Quin: My right hon. Friend the Minister and I regularly meet colleagues from the other member states and the Commission to discuss agricultural legislation. Most recently I attended the Agriculture Council on 17 April to discuss a number of issues including Beef Labelling. It is the responsibility of the Commission to ensure that member states meet their obligations to administer EU legislation properly but that does not necessarily in all cases require complete uniformity as there is scope to apply the principle of subsidiarity where appropriate.

Milk Imports

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the (a) quantity and (b) value of milk imported into the UK from non-EU countries in the last three years for which figures are available; what tariff such milk attracts; and if he will make a statement. [119656]

Ms Quin: The information requested is set out in the table:

Imports of milk from third countries

	Volume (tonnes)	Value (£000)
1997	2.1	6.3
1999	6.0	2.7

Source:
HM Customs and Excise

The import duty paid on imports of skimmed milk in January and February 1997 was 18.9 ecus per 100 kg. The import duty paid on imports of whole milk in October 1997 was 29.1 ecus per 100 kg. The import duties paid in July 1999 on imports of skimmed milk and whole milk were 15.1 euros per 100 kg and 24.8 euros per 100 kg, respectively. These are the only months in the years concerned in which imports were recorded.

Correspondence

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what target he has set for Ministers in his Department to reply to letters from hon. Members; in what proportion of cases since 1 October 1999 he has met those targets; in how many cases it has taken his Department (a) more than eight weeks and (b) more than 16 weeks to reply to letters from hon. Members; and if he will make a statement. [118933]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 13 April 2000]: Ministers in my Department aim to answer letters from hon. Members within 15 working days. Between 1 October 1999 and 31 March 2000, Ministers in my Department answered 3,098 letters from hon. Members, of which 987 (32 per cent.) were answered within 15 working days. A total of 562 letters took over eight weeks to answer: of these, 27 took longer than 16 weeks. In 1999 as a whole Ministers in my Department answered 60 per cent. of letters from hon. Members within 15 days.

The number of staff processing correspondence has been increased to improve our performance in responding to letters from hon. Members.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when the right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire will receive a reply to his letter of 8 March on behalf of his constituent, Miss Marvin. [119747]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 19 April 2000]: I replied to the right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire on 19 April.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Church Repairs (VAT)

Miss McIntosh: To ask the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, what progress has been made in respect of repairs to churches under the EC Directive adopted by the Council of Ministers on 22 October 1999 authorising member states to apply a reduced rate of VAT on a temporary basis for certain labour-intensive services. [119828]

Mr. Stuart Bell: Originally there was a suggestion that the directive might be applied to allow a lower rate of VAT on repairs to all historic and listed buildings including churches. Unfortunately the list adopted did not extend to these and the Churches will continue to press for this to be reviewed at the earliest opportunity.

Miss McIntosh: To ask the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, what plans he has to seek to ensure that VAT costs are reduced for repairs to existing church buildings and to ensure that VAT is charged exclusively on the construction of new church buildings. [119846]

Mr. Stuart Bell: The Churches continue to press the case for VAT relief on repairs to church buildings. The hon. Lady will know that I raised this at a recent meeting with my hon. Friend the Minister for the Arts in the context of the current review of policies relating to the historic environment.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Biodiversity Action Plans

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to provide a statutory framework for the UK biodiversity action plans. [120210]

Mr. Mullin: The Biodiversity Action Plan is part of the Government's response to the Convention on Biological Diversity which, as an international treaty, does not require national legislation to give effect to it. Article VI of the Convention specifically requires the preparation of a national strategy. However, the Government are reviewing the need for a statutory basis for the Plan process in the light of representations they have received.

They would in any case wish to avoid breaking down the current highly successful delivery partnerships of statutory, business and voluntary sectors.

Fifth Freedom Carriers

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many foreign Fifth Freedom carriers operate from the UK to the US; and if he will make a statement. [120085]

Mr. Mullin: Four non-UK carriers currently operate scheduled passenger services from the UK to the US using fifth freedom rights. These are Air India, Pakistan International Airlines, Olympic and Kuwait Airways. An additional four non-UK carriers operate scheduled cargo services from the UK to the US using fifth freedom rights. These are Air France, Cargolux and Lufthansa through Prestwick and El Al through London.

National Air Traffic Services

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what payments regime applies in respect of airlines using the National Air Traffic Services; what changes to such payments are proposed in advance of the Transport Bill being enacted; and if he will make a statement. [120325]

Mr. Mullin: The Civil Aviation (Route Charges for Navigation Services) Regulations 1998 (S.I. 1998/1537 and 2999) made under section 73 of the Civil Aviation Act 1982 require the operator, and on notice the owner, of any aircraft in the Flight Information Regions of Eurocontrol Member States to pay Eurocontrol a charge for air traffic services.

These are collected by Eurocontrol and a sum in respect of the services provided by the service provider in each Contracting State is paid by Eurocontrol to the Contracting State. Under article 20 of the Multilateral Agreement, National Air Traffic Services Ltd. (NATS) has been nominated by the UK as being entitled to receive the United Kingdom's share of the route charges.

By directions made by the Civil Aviation Authority under Article 79 of the Air Navigation Order (No.2) 1995 it is the responsibility of the owners or operators of specified aerodromes to procure appropriate services for the control of air traffic in their vicinity. Usually the owner or operator of the aerodrome would include the costs incurred in acquiring these services in his charges to the owners or operators of aircraft using the airport. In some cases, however, contracts have been negotiated by NATS that specify that they will charge the aircraft owners and operators direct.

The duty on the owners and operators to pay the charges is set out in the Civil Aviation (Navigation Service Charges) Regulations 2000 (S.I. 2000/599).

No changes to the current charging arrangements are proposed in advance of the Transport Bill being enacted.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) how many people are employed by National Air Traffic Services; and what the basis is of the share allocation under the public-private partnership; [120603]

(2) if employees of National Air Traffic Services will be able to sell their shares in the NATS public private partnership without restriction. [120619]

Mr. Mullin: NATS employs 5,372 people as at 31 March 1999. The final form of the employee share scheme, including the allocation to NATS' staff, and any restrictions on sale will be worked up in due course following consultation with NATS' employee representatives and, when selected, the Strategic Partner.

However, the Government are keen to ensure that the share scheme is designed to ensure that NATS' employees hold a long-term equity stake in their company and that all employees are entitled to participate on an equal basis.

Hazardous Waste Imports

Charlotte Atkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how much hazardous waste was imported into the United Kingdom during 1999 for use as fuel in cement kilns; and what were the countries of origin of that waste. [120341]

Mr. Mullin [holding answer 2 May 2000]: The estimated quantity of hazardous waste imported into the United Kingdom in 1999 for use as fuel in cement and lime kilns, broken down by country of origin, is as follows:

	Tonnes
Guernsey	13
Ireland	6,720
Jersey	18

Accurate information about imports solely for cement kilns, rather than for cement and lime kilns, could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Final figures for 1999 will not be available until the summer since, under European law, the kilns have 180 days following receipt of the waste to provide the UK enforcement authorities with a certificate of recovery confirming the actual quantity of waste used as a fuel.

CITES Delegation (Nairobi)

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the members of the UK CITES delegation to COP XI in Nairobi with a financial interest in the trade and supply of endangered species; and if he will make a statement. [120132]

Mr. Mullin [holding answer 2 May 2000]: No member of the UK Delegation to the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species' 11th Conference of the Parties in Nairobi has a financial interest in the trade and supply of endangered species. One member of the Delegation is seconded from the Cayman Islands Government Civil Service to the Cayman Turtle Farm, a Crown Corporation wholly owned by the Cayman Islands Government, as the Farm's Research Officer.

Simian Herpes B

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to deal with the potential public health risks from the transformation of the simian herpes B virus from macaques held in zoos and safari parks; and if he will make a statement. [120133]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 2 May 2000]: The Government are aware of the potential health risks of simian herpes B virus. Under health and safety legislation, as well as ensuring the health and safety of employees, employers also have to ensure that others, eg members of the public, are not exposed to risks arising from the work. Local authorities are responsible for health and safety in zoos and safari parks. The Health and Safety Executive has alerted local authority enforcement officers to the potential health risks and has given guidance on action to take should any subsequent cases arise.

Cowboy Builders

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what response he has made to the recommendation of the Cowboy Builders Working Group for a mandatory requirement for builders securing a Government-backed quality mark to provide financial protection for customers. [120551]

Ms Beverley Hughes: I announced on 6 December 1999 that the Government accepted the key recommendations of the final report produced by the Cowboy Builders Working Group, including the requirement that all quality marked builders must provide an approved third-party warranty to protect the consumer in the event that he/she experiences difficulties with the completion of the job or standard of workmanship.

Pilots of the quality mark scheme are being run in Birmingham and Somerset. The Birmingham pilot was opened to applications from builders last month, and will open to the public in June or July. The Somerset pilot will be opened to builders later this month and to the public in September or October. The aim of the pilots is to test and develop the arrangements before we take a decision on a national scheme.

Capital Receipts (Worcester)

Mr. Michael J. Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what was the value of capital receipts released to Worcester City Council for each financial year since May 1997. [120595]

Mr. Mullin: The table shows the capital allocations made to Worcester City Council under the Capital Receipts Initiative (CRI). Allocations were made in the form of Supplementary Credit Approvals.

Year	Allocations
1997–98	213,000
1998–99	678,000
1999–2000	685,000

There has been no separate allocation of resources under the CRI since 1999–2000, following the introduction of the single housing capital pot from 2000–01.

Bellwin Flood Relief Scheme (Worcestershire)

Mr. Michael J. Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how much money was refunded to (a) Worcester City Council and (b) Worcestershire County Council under the Bellwin scheme of flood relief, for each financial year since May 1997. [120596]

Ms Beverley Hughes: A "Bellwin" scheme of emergency financial assistance may be activated to help a local authority with uninsurable clear-up costs following a disaster or emergency that involves destruction of, or danger to, life or property. Grant is normally paid at a rate of 85 per cent. of an authority's qualifying expenditure above a threshold. The threshold is the provision that a prudent authority might reasonably be expected to make for contingencies and emergencies (approximately 0.2 per cent. of its revenue budget).

In the financial years 1997–98, 1998–99 and 1999–2000, Worcestershire County Council did not incur qualifying expenditure above its threshold. Grant was paid to Worcestershire City Council as follows:

1999–2000	6,874

Housing (Additional Demand)

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many extra (a) houses and (b) flats he estimates have been built in the last 30 years in order to meet additional demand created by divorce. [120671]

Mr. Mullin: The specific data requested are not available.

Rail Regulator

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is the annual budget of the Rail Regulator in the current year; and what plans he has to increase it. [120607]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 2 May 2000]: The Rail Regulator's final budget for 1999–2000 was £13.1 million, of which £9.3 million was recovered from licence fees. For 2000–01, the Rail Regulator is currently consulting on a proposed budget of £13.2 million.

Health and Safety Executive

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many inspectors there were (a) in the Field Operations Directorate of the Health and Safety Executive and (b) in each of the bands 1–4 in each of the last five years. [120389]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 2 May 2000]: The number of inspectors in the Field Operations Directorate of the Health and Safety Executive in each of the last five years is as follows:

	Number
April 1996	892
April 1997	813
April 1998	815
April 1999	837
April 2000	828

The number of inspectors in the Field Operations Directorate of the Health and Safety Executive in each of the last five years by band is as follows:

	Band 1	Band 2	Band 3	Band 4
April 1996	42	185	606	59
April 1997	34	165	522	92
April 1998	35	161	527	92
April 1999	35	156	512	134
April 2000	34	171	507	116

Note:
Between April 1996 and April 1997 80 staff were transferred, during an internal reorganisation, to the new Chemical and Hazardous Installations Division.

PARIS (Personnel Administration and Records Integrated System) live data as at 26 April 2000

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent research his Department has commissioned on the effectiveness of unannounced preventive inspectors by the HSE in preventing accidents at work. [120387]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 2 May 2000]: HSE has recently initiated a research project entitled "Proving Inspection Works". The aim of the project is to develop a methodology by which HSE can progressively evaluate the impact inspectors achieve in their various regulatory encounters with duty holders in order to maximise their effects.

It is hoped that "Proving Inspection Works" will demonstrate the value of unannounced preventive inspections, but it may be optimistic to say that a direct link can be proved between such an inspection and a reduction in accidents at a particular workplace. The project is looking to measure the promotion of positive risk management behaviours as well as reducing specific hazards and risks.

Traffic-free Areas

Mr. Bill O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will publish planning guidance notes for local authorities to maintain and introduce traffic-free and pedestrian-only areas for town and city centres. [120385]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Government published a revised public consultation draft of Planning Policy Guidance Note 13 on Transport in October last year which encourages local authorities to give greater priority to walking using measures such as pedestrianisation schemes in town and local centres where vehicle access is restricted or prohibited. We intend to publish the final version of PPG13 later this year.

Family Statistics (Homelessness)

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many people classified as homeless there were in (a) 1970, (b) 1980 and (c) 1999; and how many came from (i) intact families, and (ii) broken families. [120676]

Mr. Mullin: Data on homelessness activity reported by local authorities in England include the number of households accepted as homeless and in priority need under the homelessness provisions of the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977, and subsequent legislation. 57,850 such households were accepted in 1980 and 104,770 in 1999. These figures are not comparable because of legislative changes since 1977.

Local authority homelessness responsibilities under earlier legislation were significantly more limited, and data for 1970 are not available.

Information is also reported about the main reasons for loss of the household's last settled home, including "Breakdown of relationship with partner". In 1980 this accounted for around 20 per cent. of all cases, and 24 per cent. in 1999.

Telecommunications Masts

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the effect on farmers of planning restrictions on mobile telephone masts. [120577]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Government policy on the development of telecommunication masts is to encourage and facilitate the roll-out of a modern national telecommunications system while protecting the environment. This is reflected in the current framework of law and guidance on planning for such development.

As we said in the Action Plan on Farming launched recently by the Prime Minister, we recognise the benefits of mobile phones for rural communities and will consider ways of fulfilling the roll-out of mobile phone networks in rural areas while keeping environmental intrusion to a minimum and taking account of the recommendations of the forthcoming report of the Independent Expert Group on Mobile Phones.

Redundant Building Grant Programme

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proportion of the increase in the Redundant Building Grant Programme will be dedicated to farm-based enterprise. [120575]

Mr. Mullin: We have made clear to RDAs our intention that the whole of the £4 million increase should be targeted at farm enterprises, and to that end have removed for farmers the area-based limitation and widened the employment test.

Farm-based Horse Enterprises

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how the extension of rate relief to farm-based horse enterprises will be funded; and what effect such an extension of rate relief will have on central Government funding. [120573]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Farm premises used for the breeding and rearing of horses already receive a rate concession. The Prime Minister announced on 30 March 2000 that the Government would consult on proposals to extend rate relief to other horse enterprises linked to farm premises. We are currently considering the options along with other preparatory work for the Rural White Paper and will consult on these proposals later this year.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Omagh Bombing (Police Investigation)

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many RUC detectives are engaged (a) full-time and (b) part-time on the Omagh Bomb. [114936]

Mr. Ingram: The number of officers actively engaged in this investigation has varied at different times to meet the needs of inquiries. All appropriate resources have been made available throughout the investigation. I am advised that there are currently 20 detective officers working full-time on the inquiry team, all on a full-time basis.

Social Fund

Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what the Northern Ireland social fund discretionary budget will be for 2000–01. [120910]

Mr. George Howarth: I am pleased to announce that the social fund gross discretionary budget for 2000–01 will be £45.95 million. £10.06 million will be allocated to grants; £35.79 million to loans and £0.1 million will be held as a contingency reserve. The new allocations represent an increase of £3.13 million over the initial gross budget set at April 1999.

The Community Care Grant (CCG) budget has been increased by £0.2 million to £10.06 million. This will provide more help to CCG applicants, in particular families with children and the disabled.

The loans budget has been increased to £35.79 million, an increase of £2.93 million on the initial 1999–2000 loans budget. To improve the fairness of the scheme budgets will be allocated in a way that will, over time, achieve greater consistency of outcome for applicants wherever they live.

Details of the individual District budget allocations, together with a note explaining the basis on which they have been made, have been placed in the Library today.

Patten Proposals

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if, when he publishes his Implementation Plan for the Patten proposals, he will list those items on which the Chief Constable has already started out. [120648]

Mr. Ingram: The Implementation Plan will show the items where the Chief Constable has the lead responsibility for taking work forward and any progress which has already been made.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if, when he publishes his Implementation Plan for the Patten proposals he will indicate those proposals which have human rights and equality implications that have been referred to the Human Rights and Equality Commissions and their replies in each case. [120649]

Mr. Ingram: The Implementation Plan will set out for each recommendation which has been accepted, the programme of work required and who has the lead responsibility for taking the work forward. It will be for those with the lead responsibility to consult and work with the Human Rights and Equality Commissions, as appropriate, in taking the work forward.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if on the date he publishes the proposed legislation to implement the Patten report and the implementation plan he will name the Oversight Commissioner and the Commissioner's assistants. [120644]

Mr. Ingram: The search for a suitable candidate for appointment as Oversight Commissioner is in hand. The Government will make an announcement in due course.

Police Services

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will promote a competition between the schools and colleges of Northern Ireland to design a politically neutral new badge and insignia for the Police Services of Northern Ireland. [120650]

Mr. Ingram: No.

Elections

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps have been taken to introduce a proportional representation system of voting for parliamentary elections in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement. [119564]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I have been asked to reply.

We have made it clear that any change to the voting system used for elections to the House of Commons would first require the endorsement of the people of the United Kingdom in a referendum.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 3 May. [119396]

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 3 May. [120345]

The Prime Minister: This morning I met Nelson Mandela as well as having meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I will have further such meetings later today.

Performance and Innovation Unit

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Prime Minister what the Government have done to implement the findings of the Performance and Innovation Unit in respect of (a) the rural economy, (b) e-commerce, (c) management of cross-cutting policies and (d) analysis and modelling in central Government. [119952]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 20 April 2000]: The Government take the implementation of the conclusions of Performance and Innovation Unit reports very seriously. Where appropriate, project reports contain implementation plans, including lead responsibilities and timetables for action.

In respect of each of the reports the hon. Member refers to:

(a) Rural economies—the report, "Rural Economies", was published in December 1999 and invited comments on a number of issues for discussion. These are being considered as part of the work on the Rural White Paper;

(b) e-commerce—the report e-commerce@itsbest.uk was published in September 1999. The e-Minister and e-envoy are charged with taking forward the recommendations. A detailed implementation plan is published on the e-envoy's website (www.e-envoy.gov.uk) and updated monthly.

(c) cross-cutting policies—the report "Wiring it up: Whitehall's Management of Cross-cutting Policies and Services" was published in January 2000. My right hon. Friends the Chief Secretary to the Treasury and the Minister for the Cabinet Office have been asked to submit a progress report by early 2001;

(d) analysis and modelling—the report "Adding it up: Improving Analysis and Modelling in central Government" was published in January 2000. A group chaired by the Head of the Government Economic Service is overseeing progress with implementation.

Copies of these reports are available in the Libraries of the House.

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Prime Minister what subjects are currently being examined by the Performance and Innovation Unit. [119954]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 20 April 2000]: The Performance and Innovation Unit (PIU) is currently undertaking the following projects: the Post Office network; Trade and Social, Health and Environmental Objectives on the Global Stage; the Pursuit and Seizure of Criminal Assets; Strategic Options for the Electronic Delivery of Government Services; and Effective Leadership in Delivering Public Services. The PIU is also providing support to the review of adoption. The completed project on Active Ageing was published on 27 April.

Social Exclusion Unit

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Prime Minister what work is currently being done by the Social Exclusion Unit. [119957]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 20 April 2000]: In December 1999 I announce the findings of the review of the Social Exclusion Unit (SEU) and I set out the following priorities for their work programme: to complete the current programme work to develop the national strategy for neighbourhood renewal, including oversight of the 18 policy action teams; to be closely involved in establishing the arrangements for implementation of the strategy after it is announced in the summer of 2000, and to work closely with HM Treasury and other Government Departments to ensure that the 2000 Spending Review reflects the priority the Government give to tackling poverty and social exclusion.

At the same time I asked the Minister for the Cabinet Office to chair the Ministerial Network on Social Exclusion, which was given a new remit to chase progress across Government on implementation of past SEU reports, as well as acting as an informal sounding board for the unit's future work programme.

On 12 April, the SEU published a framework version of the National Strategy for Neighbourhood Renewal, for consultation. The framework sets out proposals which aim to arrest the wholesale decline of the most deprived neighbourhoods; reverse it; and prevent it from recurring. The SEU will be consulting on those proposals until the end of June. Then, following the publication of the results of the Government's Spending Review in July, the unit will set out the final strategy and give details of how it will be taken forward.

The SEU is working closely with the implementing Departments on ensuring that the action arising from the reports is carried out, to time. The SEU is regularly reviewing progress against action plans and works with the teams to unblock obstacles to progress both inside and outside of Whitehall.

The unit is also undertaking initial scoping of possible topics for a future work programme, which I will announce in the summer.

Prisoners of War

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement about the Royal British Legion's request for a special gratuity for former Far East prisoners of war or their widows. [120072]

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to him by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence on 2 May 2000, Official Report, column 7W.

Serbia

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister what exemptions have been made to the sanctions against Serbia for humanitarian reasons, with particular reference to equipment needed for (a) de-mining and (b) dealing with depleted uranium. [119349]

The Prime Minister: The EC regulations providing for the flight ban (now suspended), the oil embargo and the imposition of financial sanctions in Serbia all provide for humanitarian exemptions.

Although the UN Security Council Resolution (UNSCR) 1160 (1998) imposed an arms embargo on the FRY, UNSCR 1244 (1999) provides that prohibitions imposed by UNSCR 1160 shall not apply to the sale or supply of arms and related material for use by the international civil and security presence in Kosovo. The UK has approved a number of applications for the export of demining equipment to the FRY where such activity is taking place under the auspices of the international civil and security presence.

The export to Serbia of equipment for dealing with depleted uranium would not be covered by sanctions. However, an export licence would have to be obtained from the Department of Trade and Industry if the equipment in question was covered by the UK's strategic export controls on dual-use goods which apply to all destinations.

Staff

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Prime Minister what estimate he has made of the total staff costs for No. 10 Downing street in (a) 1996–97, (b) 1997–98, (c) 1998–99 and (d) 1999–2000. [112076]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 28 February 2000]: The staff costs for No. 10 Downing street were £3.4 million in 1996–97; £4.1 million in 1997–98; and £4.9 million in 1998–99. The provisional figure for 1999–2000 is £5.9 million.

DEFENCE

Trident Programme

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what role BNFL will play in maintaining the UK's Trident programme at AWE. [116244]

Mr. Spellar: BNFL and other members of the AWE ML consortium will be seconding a small number of middle and senior managers to AWE in the short-term, parent company nominees will reduce to only a handful of board members early in the new contract. On the exact responsibilities to be carried out by the nominees from BNFL, I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) on 15 April 2000, Official Report, column 487W.

Chinook Crash, Mull of Kintyre

Mr. Martin Bell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will provide details of the indicated airspeed of RAF Chinook ZD576 during the last 40 seconds of flight as it approached the Mull of Kintyre on 2 June 1994. [120101]

Mr. Spellar: The Board of Inquiry considered data extracted from the aircraft's systems, the Air Accident Investigation Board technical report, the flight path simulations from Boeing Helicopters and a separate investigation from Defence Research Agency Bedford, together with witness evidence. The Board concluded that it was most likely that while coasting in at the Mull of Kintyre the aircraft was established in a steady climb, with an airspeed of about 150 knots, until approximately four seconds before impact.

Birth Certificates

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what purposes his Department requires a birth certificate to be furnished by (a) employees, (b) contractors, (c) those applying for employment and contracts and (d) other persons. [120322]

Dr. Moonie: The Ministry of Defence usually requests a birth certificate from prospective employees, both Service and civilian, and individuals undertaking work for the Department, to establish proof of identity. Other official documents, however, such as a full 10-year passport, may be furnished as proof of identity and, normally, are acceptable.

Minimum Wage

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will estimate the cost to salaries paid by his

Department of an increase in the national minimum wage to all age groups to (a) £4, (b) £4.20 and (c) £4.50 an hour. [120234]

Dr. Moonie: The estimated annual cost of increasing basic pay by the amounts requested is (a) £0.6 million, (b) £1.8 million and (c) £4.5 million respectively.

Aircraft Maintenance

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the total cost of RAF aircraft maintenance and spares for the last year for which figures are available. [120277]

Dr. Moonie: The information is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

RAF Combat Aircraft

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the front line combat aircraft operated by the RAF; what is the complement of trained pilots required to operate each type; and how many trained pilots are available to fly each type. [120409]

Mr. Spellar: The information is shown in the following table:

Number of trained pilots at 27 April 2000

Aircraft type	Pilot establishment	Pilot strength
Tornado GR1/4	133	123
Tornado F3	111	103
Jaguar	57	59
Harrier	63	62
Sea Harrier	34	28

Veterans Advice Unit

Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the internet e-mail facility for the Veterans' Advice Unit will become available; and if he will make a statement. [120837]

Mr. Spellar: I am pleased to announce that the Veterans' Advice Unit is, from today, linked to the internet and may be contacted on-line by e-mail at the following address: veteransadvice@veterans.mod.uk.

The Veterans' Advice Unit has been operating successfully as a telephone helpline for 18 months and this important enhancement to the service will open the Unit up to a wider audience. In addition to the millions of ex-Servicemen and women resident in the UK, veterans living abroad, often in different time zones, will now be able to contact the Unit at their convenience and at minimal cost, using the e-mail facility.

Royal Navy Discharge Regulations

Ms Perham: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to alter the current discharge regulations for new recruits joining the Naval Service. [120838]

Mr. Spellar: With effect from 1 June 2000, all new recruits, other than re-engagements, will have a statutory right to apply to leave the Naval Service during a six month period from date of entry, subject to having completed four weeks' effective service. Recruits will be entitled to be discharged no later than 14 days from the date of submitting notice in writing to their Commanding Officer. Currently, recruits have a period of three to six months, depending on their age at entry, during which they may exercise their right to leave the Service.

Additionally, discharge fees applicable to Royal Navy Ratings and Royal Marine Other Ranks aged 17½ years or over on entry, who take up their right to leave within the six month period, are to be discontinued from 1 June 2000.

The two changes in Terms of Service will harmonise the Naval Service's discharge regulations for new recruits and mean that all new recruits, irrespective of their age on entry, will have an equal right to leave the Service in future.

HMS Phoenix

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 8 March 2000, Official Report, columns 708–09W, what was the (a) purpose, (b) nature and (c) outcome of the experiment involving 13 military volunteers at HMS Phoenix. [117078]

Dr. Moonie: This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency. I have asked the Chief Executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Matthew Taylor, dated 3 May 2000:

I am replying to your parliamentary question about the study undertaken by the Chemical and Biological Defence (CBD) sector of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (DERA) at HMS Phoenix.

The purpose of this study was to determine whether existing or proposed control methods were effective in preventing nuclear contamination of a designated toxic free area (TFA). Subjects wearing full individual protective equipment were exposed to harmless particles to simulate nuclear fallout. They were then processed through the entry system under evaluation into the TFA, replicating the undressing and decontamination procedures appropriate to that system. The effectiveness of the entry system was tested using air sampling techniques in the TFA. None of the volunteers who took part in the trial experienced adverse effects. The results will be used to revise entry and exit procedures to reduce the potential for the transfer of nuclear contaminated material.

I hope the above is helpful.

MOD Accommodation

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many properties earmarked for naval officers have been built by his Department (a) in total and (b) in the Portsmouth area in each of the last four years; at what cost; and if he will make a statement. [118652]

Dr. Moonie: The Defence Housing Executive (DHE) is the MOD agency responsible for managing Service housing in England, Wales and Scotland and, as a Tri-Service organisation, it does not build properties specifically for any one Service.

53 officers' quarters were built in Putney between 1995 and 1997 at a cost of £4.6 million, a small majority of which are occupied by Naval officers. At Taranto Hill, Ilchester, 34 officers' quarters are in course of construction as part of a larger project, at an approximate cost of £2.7 million. The majority of occupants will be Naval officers based at RNAS Yeovilton.

Four Private Finance Initiative contracts have been placed by DHE covering requirements for new officers' accommodation for Lossiemouth, Shawbury, Glasgow (at Paisley) and Yeovilton, of which only those at Yeovilton will be mainly occupied by Naval officers. These PFI houses will not be owned by DHE and the cost will be paid through a monthly payment by DHE to the owners for the properties required. Payment will be dependent on the quality of service provided.

Two further PFI contracts are planned, one to cover accommodation requirements at Waddington and one to cover requirements at Bristol, Bath, Shrivenham and Portsmouth, of which the 70 houses for Portsmouth will be mainly occupied by Naval officers' families. Because of land ownership issues, some 15 of the 70 may be built with MOD capital and be MOD owned. Firm costs are not yet available and are likely to be commercially sensitive.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many naval officers in the greater Portsmouth area are living in privately rented accommodation and awaiting MOD accommodation; how many of them have been waiting for more than six months; and if he will make a statement. [118655]

Dr. Moonie: 106 naval officers and their families are presently accommodated in non-Service family quarters in the greater Portsmouth area. Forty-two have been resident over six months. New applicants are allocated Service accommodation as it becomes available so that mid tour moves should not be necessary.

There are no naval officers being provided with single rented accommodation in the greater Portsmouth area at the present time.

Ferry Charter Costs

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much has been spent on charter costs for ferries to transport military assets in each of the last five years; on how many occasions and to what locations equipment was moved; and if he will make a statement. [119165]

Dr. Moonie: The information requested is not available on a consistent basis prior to Financial Year (FY) 1996–97. The following table shows the number of ships, excluding tankers, chartered from FY 1996–97 to FY 1999–2000 to transport military assets.

Charter costs 1996–97 to 1999–2000

Warship Construction

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what measures his Department is taking to ensure that the UK retains the capacity for warship construction; [119335]

(2) if he will instruct the UK Defence Procurement Agency to ensure that UK suppliers are not disadvantaged in relation to foreign competition in respect of contracts for warship construction; and if he will make a statement. [119405]

Dr. Moonie: Government policy, which is followed by the Defence Procurement Agency, is for warships to be built in the UK. UK warship builders are not, therefore, disadvantaged in relation to foreign competition.

The shipbuilding programme that has emerged from the Strategic Defence Review represents a considerable commitment and provides UK Shipbuilding Industry with a firm basis to invest, and modernise.

Taken together, the policy for warship building and the future requirements for warships should ensure that the UK retains the capacity for warship construction.

Websites

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what his Department's policy is on (a) advertising and (b) acknowledging company sponsorship on the websites of his Department, agencies and non-departmental public bodies; which companies (i) have placed advertisements and (ii) are acknowledged as sponsors on those websites; how much revenue has been received for each financial year since 1997 from such advertisements and sponsorship; and if that revenue has been retained within the budget of his Department, agencies and non-departmental public bodies. [119543]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 19 April 2000]: My Department's policies on advertising and sponsorship of its Departmental websites come under the existing conventions on Government publishing and advertising as set out in the Guidance on the Work of the Government Information Service, which can be found at http://www.cabinet-office.gov.uk/central/1999/workgis/index.htm. The Department's websites are subject to the policy guidelines issued by the Cabinet Office on the use, management and design of Government websites. These guidelines are available at http://www.iagchampions.gov.uk/guidelines/websites. They permit the use of advertisements and sponsorship on Government websites.

No advertisements and no sponsorship acknowledgements which generate revenue appear on the Department's principal websites, nor have there been any in the past. To the best of my knowledge this applies also to the websites maintained by individual Defence Agencies, units and non-departmental public bodies.

Where a company has sponsored a major Service event and a related web page exists on one of the Department's websites, that page has on occasion included the company's logo which in some cases links to the company's own website. This has been the case with some events announced on the Royal Navy and British Army websites, but no revenue has been generated by the appearance of logos. The websites for the Red Arrows and Blue Eagles aerobatic teams have been provided at no cost by commercial web designers Deltaweb, who provide a link to their own site. Some other sites, designed under contract, include acknowledgements and links to their designers' own websites.

The Ministry of Defence's main website includes a search facility provided free of charge by the International Relations and Security Network and Eurospider Information Technology AG, under the auspices of NATO's Partnership for Peace initiative. The Met. Office website similarly uses free search facilities provided by Excite.com. Links are provided to their websites. No revenue has been generated in the process.

The British Defence Staff (Washington) has a specific responsibility to promote UK defence exports to the United States. In pursuit of this objective, the BDS(W) website promotes specific items of defence equipment and its manufacturers. In addition the site search facility is presently advertiser-supported but provided free of charge by freefind.com.

Of the Department's non-departmental public bodies, the Royal Navy Submarine Museum currently includes links to BAE Systems to recognise sponsorship of museum exhibits. However, no revenue has been generated by the appearance of the relevant logos and links on the website.

Entry Licences

Angela Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence who issues licences to enter his Department's land on Salisbury Plain. [119928]

Dr. Moonie: Licences to enter Salisbury Plain Training Area are issued by Defence Estates once approval has been given by the Commandant Army Training Estate Salisbury Plain. I refer my hon. Friend to the answer which the then Under-Secretary of State for Defence, my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Kilfoyle) gave to her on 17 January 2000, Official Report, column 280W, on the licensing procedure.

Angela Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many licences to enter his Department's land have been issued in (a) 1996, (b) 1997, (c) 1998, (d) 1999 and (e) 2000 to date; [119926]

(2) how many licences to enter his Department's land have been (a) revoked and (b) curtailed in (i) 1996, (ii) 1997, (iii) 1998, (iv) 1999 and (v) 2000 to date; [119927]

(3) who has responsibility for ensuring that conditions on licences to enter his Department's land are adhered to; [119929]

(4) what action can be taken against (a) bodies and (b) individuals who contravene the terms and conditions of licences to enter his Department's land. [119925]

Dr. Moonie: The information on the number of licences issued to enter Ministry of Defence land and also how many of these have been revoked or curtailed is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Once licences are issued, however, licence holders are required to operate within the terms of their licence. Responsibility for ensuring that this occurs rests both with Defence Estates (an agency of the Ministry of Defence) and the establishment where the activity occurs.

Action on the contravention of any licence is dependent both on the activity involved and in what way the agreement has been contravened. For example, if damage has occurred the licence holder can be asked to pay for any repairs that may be necessary.

Procurement Programme Studies

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the occasions since May 1997 when alternative studies have been initiated for procurement programmes once a preferred supplier has been selected, indicating the cost of those studies in each case. [118971]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 17 April 2000]: Information of this sort is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Tritium

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 3 April 2000 to the hon. Member for Angus, (Mr. Welsh), Official Report, column 303W, on tritium, for what reason disclosure of tritium production details would be contrary to national defence and security interests. [120065]

Mr. Hoon: The Government are committed to being as open as possible about Britain's nuclear forces. However, disclosure of tritium production details could provide the means to assess nuclear weapon design data, offering an unwelcome insight into our nuclear capabilities. In addition, when answering questions on defence nuclear issues, we must observe our obligations under the terms of Article 1 of the 1970 Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. It is on these grounds that I am withholding this information under Exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Defence and Clothing Research Establishment

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many staff were employed at the Defence and Clothing Research Establishment at Colchester; when the decision was taken to transfer all the operations to Bicester; and how many staff it is estimated will be transferring to the new site; [120592]

(2) when the Defence and Clothing Research Establishment at Colchester was due to transfer to Bicester; what is the current anticipated date when the transfer will be completed; what is the cause of the delay; and if he will make a statement. [120593]

Mr. Spellar: When DCTA was formed in November 1994, the intention from the outset was that the different elements would collocate to Caversfield. This would generate efficiencies by rationalising technical facilities at the Agency's Didcot and Colchester sites and by reducing the number of staff required to run one site as compared to three. However, it was not until July 1996 that a firm date of November 1998 was decided for the transfer of the Colchester Science & Technology Department (S&TD) element. At that time, the establishment of S&TD comprised a total of 147 staff was expected to increase by 1998 to 156. The current estimate of the number of staff from Colchester intending to transfer to the Caversfield site is 84, although all staff at Colchester still have the offer of a job at Caversfield, should they decide to move.

The original date for the transfer has been affected by a number of studies into the future of DCTA. However, none of these studies raised any point which significantly altered the original plan and the then Minister for the Armed Forces, my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson), confirmed the collocation on 1 April 1999.

The Collocation is now expected to be completed by February 2001, which represents a total delay of some two years and three months over the original date. The causes are as follows:

(a) Private Finance Initiative (PFI) Study 1997: delay incurred one year.

(b) McKinsey Study (SDR) 1998 recommending S&TD/DERA Study into what elements (if any) should go to DERA on Value for Money grounds: delay incurred 11 months.

(c) English Heritage—Proposed listing of Caversfield Buildings; its impact upon refurbishment proposals, necessitated some redesign: delay incurred four months.

Despite the various delays, we now fully expect that the revised date for completion will be met. DCTA is currently evaluating the various tenders that have been received for the refurbishment of the remaining buildings on the Caversfield site, and the programme is expected to be undertaken during Summer/Autumn 2000.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Lord Levy

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the cost to public funds of Lord Levy's visit to Morocco, broken down by (a) expenses and (b) other costs. [118791]

Mr. Hain [holding answer 12 April 2000]: I refer to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 22 February 2000, Official Report, column 852W. This was also the case in relation to the Morocco visit.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whom the Prime Minister's special envoy met on his recent trip to Morocco. [118794]

Mr. Hain [holding answer 12 April 2000]: Lord Levy met a range of senior figures, including King Mohammed VI, to whom he delivered a personal message from the Prime Minister.

Amsterdam Treaty

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs for what reason no fines have been imposed under Article 228(2) of the Amsterdam Treaty; and what representations he has made calling for such fines be imposed. [119811]

Mr. Vaz: Article 228(2) applies if a member state fails to respond to a Court judgment. The vast majority of cases is settled well before this stage. Over the last three years, the Annual Report on monitoring the application of Community law records that the Commission has referred 14 cases to the European Court of Justice for a second time, recommending fines in each case. The fact that no penalties have yet been imposed by the Court does not indicate that the system is not working. On the contrary, it shows that member states have responded to the possibility of a fine by rapidly coming into line with EC law, either before the case is referred to the ECJ for a second time or shortly afterwards.

Plutonium Exports (United States)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what communications have been received by the (a) scientific and (b) Atomic Energy Counsellors in the British Embassy in Washington DC since May 1997, from the (i) United States Department of Energy and (ii) other US nuclear authorities, in respect of the agreements affecting plutonium exported from the United Kingdom to the United States and the use to which that material has been put. [120252]

Mr. Hain: There is no Atomic Energy Counsellor at the Embassy in Washington. Since May 1997 the Science, Technology, Environment and Energy Counsellor has received routine communications from the United States Government on the movement of nuclear material exported from the United Kingdom to the United States, and the use to which that material has been put. These have formed part of the normal process of consultation between our two Governments.

Entry Clearance (Islamabad)

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) with reference to the operation of the interim appointment system in Islamabad for applicants seeking entry clearance (a) by what criteria an application is judged to be straightforward, (b) by whom this decision is made, (c) how an applicant is informed that the application is regarded as straightforward, (d) what types of visa application can be considered under this system and (e) if an existing applicant awaiting interview can take advantage of the scheme; [120487]

(2) how many applications for entry clearance have been considered under the interim appointment system in Islamabad; and of these, how many were (a) accepted and (b) refused, for each type of visa application. [120488]

Mr. Vaz: There is no interim appointment system in operation at Islamabad. There is, however, a fast-track scheme for spouses in the settlement queue, whereby they can present themselves for interview on any Tuesday. Applicants who meet the relevant criteria of the Immigration Rules without the need for any additional inquiry are granted entry clearance. Those who do not are invited to return for further interview on the date of their original appointment.

No statistics are kept for those granted entry clearance, or deferred to their original appointment, during this process. All of those who attend have their applications considered by an Entry Clearance Officer.

Iraq

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what oil revenues are available to Iraq for purchasing (a) food and (b) medical supplies under UN sanctions; and if he will make a statement. [120363]

Mr. Hain: Under the UN "oil for food" programme, Iraq can export unlimited amounts of oil to fund the purchase of food, medical supplies and other humanitarian relief. With Iraq now among the world's largest oil producers again, and given that its oil reserves are second only to those of Saudi Arabia, more than $10 billion a year should be available for the humanitarian programme. It is, however, for Iraq to decide how much of that money will be spent on essential food and medicines for the Iraqi people.

Valerie Davey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what goods on the UK Military List have recently been approved for export to Iraq. [120839]

Mr. Hain: Following consultation with the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Ministry of Defence, the Department of Trade and Industry recently approved a licence to export de-mining equipment to Iraq for use by UN personnel in a humanitarian de-mining programme. The export of the equipment was approved by the UN Sanctions Committee under the Oil for Food programme.

International Criminal Court

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the United Kingdom will ratify the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court. [120355]

Mr. Hain: The UK requires legislation before we can ratify the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court. This legislation will be published in draft form in the current Parliamentary session and introduced as soon as the Parliamentary timetable allows.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on recent progress being made to establish an International Criminal Court. [120354]

Mr. Hain: To date the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court has been signed by 96 States and ratified by eight. The Court will be established once 60 States ratify. A Preparatory Commission is making good progress and is expected to complete the drafting of two important subsidiary documents to the Statute during its next session in June.

Visa Correspondence Unit

Mr. Leslie: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress he has made in reducing the backlog of correspondence in the Visa Correspondence Unit. [120911]

Mr. Vaz: I am pleased to inform the House that the Visa Correspondence Unit's backlog of correspondence with Members has been reduced so that there are now only 45 letters from Members which have not been answered within the 15 working day target, compared to 851 on 27 January. Forty-five is, of course, still too many and we will continue to work to improve our performance.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Winter Fuel Payments (Gosport)

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when residents of Gosport will receive their winter fuel payments. [119840]

Angela Eagle: The administration of benefits is a matter for Alexis Cleveland, the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency to answer. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Alexis Cleveland to Mr. Peter Viggers, daied 2 May 2000:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking when residents in Gosport will receive their winter fuel payments (WFP).

Our records show that 10.2 million WFPs were issued in November 1999. Of these, around 5 million were issued directly to Post Offices, the remainder were issued to customers home address or direct to their bank accounts. For security reasons, Post Offices were advised to return any uncollected girocheques to the Benefits Agency by 21st December 1999. Approximately 85,000 were returned by the Post Office. My staff have been contacting customers whose payments were returned to ascertain the reason for non-collection and re-issue payments where possible. All payments were made before the end of March with the exception of those where the customer has still not responded to our enquiries.

Following the ruling in the case of Taylor, the age at which Winter Fuel Payments can be made was to be equalised at 60, and the need to be in receipt of a qualifying benefit is removed. As before, these payments are intended for people who are ordinarily resident in Great Britain.

In order to meet the requirements of the European Court of Justice ruling it was necessary to identify the new beneficiaries from people aged 60 and over and build processes to ensure that this year's payments, and payments for past winters, could be made as soon as possible.

The Secretary of State for Social Security wrote to all MPs on 11 April setting out the planned delivery arrangements to make these payments. As he indicated, the current plan is to begin making payments for past winters from the end of June onwards and to make this coming winter's payments before Christmas.

I hope this is helpful.

Disability Living Allowance

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what the guidelines are in respect of comments by the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency on decisions by Benefits Agency decision makers on claims for Disability Living Allowance. [120088]

Mr. Rooker: The administration of Disability Living Allowance is a matter for Alexis Cleveland, the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency, who will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Alexis Cleveland to Mr. Anthony Steen, dated 2 May 2000:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking what guidelines there are in respect of comments by the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency (BA) on decisions by BA decision makers on claims for disability benefit living allowance.

Decision makers in the BA make decisions fairly and impartially on behalf of the Secretary of State. No one, including myself, can interfere with the decision making process.

This is a long-standing principle designed to ensure that all claims and questions put before decision makers are treated equitably.

I am responsible for monitoring the quality of decision making within the agency and am advised on the quality of decisions taken by an independently chaired Standards Committee.

There will be an annual published report on the quality of decision making in agencies.

I hope this is helpful.

Vaccine Damaged Children

Mr. Tony Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when the Government will announce a financial settlement for vaccine damaged children. [120727]

Mr. Bayley: The results of our review of the Vaccine Damage Payments scheme are in preparation but have not yet been finalised.

Sure Start Maternity Grant

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people received Sure Start Maternity Grant in 1999–2000; and how many are expected to receive it in (a) 2000–01 and (b) 2001–02. [119948]

Angela Eagle [holding answer 20 April 2000]: Sure Start Maternity Grant (SSMG) was introduced from 27 March 2000 to replace the £100 Maternity Payment, and is payable for children expected, born or adopted on or after 11 June. Maternity payments will continue for children expected, born or adopted before 11 June. Since both Maternity payments and SSMG payments will be made during 2000–01, figures for the two benefits are in the following table for the relevant years.

Number of people receiving Sure Start Maternity Grant and Maternity Payment

	Sure Start Maternity Grant	Maternity Payment
1999–2000	[1]—	171,827

Child Poverty

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when his Department first announced plans to halve child poverty in 10 years and eradicate child poverty in 20 years; and when these targets are due to be met. [120238]

Mr. Bayley: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister announced our aim to end child poverty in 20 years in the Beveridge Lecture on 18 March 1999. Following this, we published "Opportunity for all" (Cm 4445, September 1999) placing tackling poverty and social exclusion at the heart of this Government's agenda. Reinforcing our commitment to ending child poverty, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced our ambition to halve child poverty "by the end of the next decade" in his 1999 Pre-Budget Report.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Child Labour

8. Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what steps she has taken to address the problem of child labour in the developing world. [119360]

Clare Short: Our Government played a key role in brokering the agreement on the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour at the International Labour Organisation (ILO) in 1999. We have contributed $1 million per annum for the last two years to support ILO programmes to eliminate child labour and are working with the ILO on projects to eliminate child labour in India and Tanzania, and to restrict trafficking in children in South-East Asia.

Gap-year Students

9. Mr. St. Aubyn: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the role of her Department in appointing year-out students on development projects overseas. [119362]

Clare Short: The Department for International Development does not appoint year-out students on development projects overseas. Developing countries require access to know how to build local capacity. Our volunteer schemes such as Voluntary Service Overseas and British Executive Services Overseas provide volunteers with skills in areas needed by developing countries.

Debt Relief

10. Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what recent representations she has received from Christian Aid about third-world debt. [119363]

Clare Short: On 4 April, the Chancellor and I met a number of faith leaders and directors of voluntary organisations, including Christian Aid, at one of our regular seminars on debt and poverty reduction. I continue to receive many letters on debt, including from Christian Aid supporters.

23. Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what steps her Department is taking to ensure that the amount of debt relief granted to the world's poorest countries is increased. [119377]

Clare Short: We were instrumental in securing the revision of the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) Initiative, which provides faster, wider and deeper debt relief for the poorest countries. The new framework will deliver $50 billion in debt relief. In addition, the Government have announced that they will provide 100 per cent. bilateral relief on all remaining export credit debt for qualifying HIPC countries. Some other countries, including the rest of the G7, have agreed additional debt relief beyond the HIPC framework.

At the Spring Meetings of the World bank and IMF last month, the international community agreed to set up a joint World bank/IMF Committee to oversee the implementation of the enhanced HIPC framework, and to provide regular progress reports to the two Executive Boards. I welcome this measure.

The financing for the revised Initiative has yet to be identified in full. The UK has made the largest commitment to date to the HIPC Trust Fund—over $350 million, including our share of the European Community contribution.

Ethiopia

11. Mr. Russell Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what is the total amount of emergency assistance that her Department has committed to Ethiopia in response to the current famine. [119364]

Clare Short: We have responded quickly and appropriately to emerging emergency needs in Ethiopia. Since June 1999 we have committed some £9.3 million in food and non-food relief. The food aid element is over 30,000 metric tonnes. In addition, we contribute about 17 per cent. of the cost of EC food aid; estimated to be some 432,000 metric tonnes this year. We are ready to commit more funds if new needs emerge.

16. Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement about the aid she is providing to Ethiopia. [119370]

Clare Short: We have responded quickly and appropriately to emerging emergency needs in Ethiopia. Since June 1999 we have committed £9.3 million in food and non-food relief. The food aid element is over 30,000 metric tonnes. In addition, we contribute about 17 per cent. of the cost of EC food aid: estimated to be some 432,000 metric tonnes this year.

Because of the war with Eritrea we, like other donors, have reduced long-term development aid because we are not confident that the resources would be used to benefit the people of the country.

India

12. Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what her policy is on linking aid to India with good governance; and if she will make a statement. [119365]

Clare Short: Our "Country Strategy for India", published in 1999, stresses the crucial importance of good governance to India's development. One of the five strategic objectives for our programme in India is to promote accountable government delivering pro-poor reform and growth and effective services.

A key element of the Strategy is the focusing of our effort and funding on the governments of selected Indian states which have high concentrations of poor people. The criteria for choice of states include:

a commitment by the government to reduce poverty, including a willingness to make radical shifts in fiscal priorities, tackle difficult social issues, overhaul the delivery of public services and decentralise more power and money to local government; and a desire to improve standards of governance.

We intend to increase substantially the proportion of its bilateral development assistance to India devoted to improving governance at national and state levels.

Africa

13. Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement about development aid to east Africa. [119366]

Clare Short: British bilateral development assistance to Kenya, Tanzania and Uganda totalled about £130 million in 1999–2000. Assistance to Tanzania and Uganda is set to increase substantially over the next three years in support of Government-led efforts to strengthen economic management and reduce poverty, which are being pursued further through the preparation of Poverty Reductions Strategy Papers (PRSP). In Kenya, the Government are seeking to negotiate a new economic reform programme with the IMF, in preparation for which it is preparing an interim PRSP. We are ready, if Kenya reaches agreement on a credible poverty reduction programme with the international financial institutions, substantially to increase development assistance.

15. Sir Sydney Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement about aid to the Horn of Africa. [119368]

Clare Short: Planned expenditure in countries in the Horn of Africa is shown at Annex 1, Table 5 of the DFID Departmental Report 2000.

Overseas Development (Expenditure)

14. Mr. Bradshaw: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what progress has been made towards meeting the Government's target for expenditure on overseas development as a proportion of gross domestic product. [119367]

Clare Short: DFID assistance to developing countries in the last financial year is estimated at £2.212 billion, an increase of 8.5 per cent. in real terms over the expenditure of £1.987 billion in 1998–99. This increase reflects the first year of the Comprehensive Spending Round settlement in 1998, as part of which an extra £1.6 billion was allocated for development spending. Under this, DFID's budget will increase by £365 million in the current financial year and by a further £307 million in 2001–02.

I should also inform the House that we have today submitted to the OECD our provisional figures for official development assistance for the 1999 calendar year. We estimate that net ODA for the calendar year will be £2.03 billion. This results from the different time-frame of our financial year and the Development Assistance Committee's use of the calendar year and is largely the consequence of the timing of the deposit of promissory notes in respect of IDA and the African. Development Fund, lower than predicted spending by the EC, and the timing of bringing to book expenditure on Kosovo. This will produce an anomalous calendar year ODA/GNP ratio of 0.23 per cent. We expect that ODA in 2000 will be 0.29 per cent. of GNP, rising in 2001 to 0.30 per cent. of GNP.

Zimbabwe

17. Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the effectiveness of British development aid to Zimbabwe. [119371]

Clare Short: The effectiveness of development assistance to Zimbabwe is kept under regular review. Projects are professionally appraised, monitored and evaluated to assess their impact on poverty. We also review the impact of the wider political and economic environment on progress. Our present assessment is that our portfolio so far has been broadly effective, but that new government-led projects would not be less effective until current governance and economic management issues are resolved. New projects are therefore channelled largely through civil society organisations.

18. Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on her Department's aid to Zimbabwe. [119372]

20. Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on her Department's programme in Zimbabwe. [119374]

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the future of the aid programme to the Government of Zimbabwe. [119358]

Clare Short: We are continuing to monitor events in Zimbabwe very closely, and are keeping programme activities under review to ensure that they can still be effective. We are particularly concerned about the failure of the police to uphold court orders against farm invaders; to provide protection under the law; and to act impartially in policing demonstrations. I have therefore suspended DFID support to an Aid and Trade Provision project supplying Land Rovers to the Zimbabwe Republic Police.

Iraq

19. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what aid in the form of water pumps she has sent to Iraq via the United Nations. [119373]

Clare Short: In the centre and south of Iraq we have committed £5.3 million to Care International for water and sanitation projects and £3 million to the International Committee of the Red Cross whose programme includes rehabilitating water and sanitation services. In northern Iraq we have supported a number of water and sanitation projects over recent years through NGOs. We are not providing water pumps to UN agencies. These are being imported into Iraq through the oil-for-food programme, and where practicable, our programmes make use of them.

South Asia

21. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what steps she is taking to help end the system of bonded labour in south Asia. [119375]

Clare Short: The Government are working for the elimination of bonded labour in several ways. We played a key role in discussions to draw up the International Labour Organisation's (ILO) Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work (1998) and the Convention for the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour (1999) which both outlaw bonded labour and provide international standards and monitoring mechanisms. The UK has provided $2 million over the last two financial years to ILO's International Programme for the Elimination of Child Labour (IPEC). Many child labourers in south Asia work under bonded conditions.

At country and regional level we are working with the ILO, national Governments, trades unions and other civil society organisations to promote labour rights and tackle the poverty which usually underlies abuses. One of the causes of bondage is indebtedness to landowners. We are supporting micro-credit schemes which aim to provide alternative sources of affordable finance to poor people.

In the UK we are supporting the Ethical Trading Initiative (ETI), a consortium of business, trades unions and non-governmental organisations which encourages companies, many of whom have suppliers in south Asia, to adopt codes of conduct including labour standards throughout their supply chain.

Malaria

22. Mr. Beard: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what steps her Department is taking to help developing countries combat malaria. [119376]

Clare Short: The World Health Organisation (WHO) estimates that malaria kills one million people a year, mainly in Africa. We are strongly supporting the WHO-led Roll Back Malaria (RBM) initiative to achieve the goal of reducing the malaria burden by half by 2010. The RBM initiative provides the vehicle for concerted action by partners, especially in Africa, to deliver more widely the benefits of currently available methods of malaria control to the poorest. Overall UK developmental programme spending on malaria control activities has increased tenfold in the last five years. We are also supporting public-private partnerships to develop the new generation of affordable drugs required for malaria control in developing countries, both by direct funding to WHO through such initiatives as the Medicines for Malaria Venture (MMV), the Lapdap product development programme and the Malarone donation programme.

Kosovo

24. Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what help her Department is giving in the clearing of land mines in Kosovo. [119378]

Clare Short: We have provided over £7 million during the 1999–2000 financial year for the clearance of mines and unexploded ordnance in Kosovo. So far we have committed a further £6.6 million during 2000–01. The great majority of this funding is going to four mine clearance organisations. We have also supported the UN Mine Action Co-ordination Centre through contributions in cash and in kind.

Famine Relief

25. Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what famine relief operations are being undertaken by (a) her Department and (b) UK aid agencies in Ethiopia and Eritrea. [119379]

Clare Short: (a) Details of the emergency interventions we have funded in Ethiopia between June 1999 and April 2000 are outlined in the DFID Background Briefing on Ethiopia, April 2000, a copy of which has been placed in the Library of the House. In addition, we are also providing £1 million to the International Committee of the Red Cross to cover food and transport costs and some £1.3 million to Farm Africa for work in Konso. Britain also contributes about 17 per cent. of the cost of EC food aid for Ethiopia; estimated to be some 432,000 metric tonnes this year. In Eritrea this year, we have provided £200,000 to Oxfam for emergency water/sanitation interventions for people displaced by the conflict. In addition, we also provide 17 per cent. of the cost of EC interventions in Eritrea.

(b) We do not maintain records of interventions by NGOs and other aid agencies.

Burma and Thailand

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what representations she has received from non-governmental organisations working in Burma and Thailand about her Department's policies towards those countries. [119350]

Clare Short: We have not had any representations from non-governmental organisations working in Burma and Thailand about our policies, but we have consulted non-governmental organisations about the situation in Burma in preparing a Country Strategy Paper that we shall publish shortly.

Commonwealth Development Corporation

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what progress has been made on the change in status of the Commonwealth Development Corporation. [119369]

Clare Short: On 8 December 1999 Commonwealth Development Corporation was transformed from a statutory corporation into a public limited company registered under the name of CDC Group plc. It now operates within the framework designed for the Public/Private Partnership. This entrenches an investment policy focusing on investment in poorer countries. For the time being CDC remains wholly Government-owned.

Palestinian Authority

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on UK development aid to the Palestinian Authority. [119361]

Clare Short: Our bilateral development assistance for the West Bank and the Gaza Strip is focused on co-operation with the Palestinian Authority to build a nation through support for the peace process (eg improving Palestinian administrative systems and analytical resources); institution and capacity building (eg improving health and education services); and empowering civil society (eg through non-government organisations working on gender and law issues). We currently spend some £8 million a year on the programme. In addition we contribute a similar sum to the United Nations Relief Works Agency for Palestinian Refugees in support of its core activities and to assist in improving service delivery. Our share of European Community and other multilateral programmes for the Palestinians takes our average annual contribution to over £25 million.

Poor Countries

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what proportion of her Department's budget was spent in the world's poorest countries in the last financial year. [119359]

Clare Short: Our Government have committed themselves to increase the focus of our aid spending on the poorest people and the poorest countries. The proportion of our country programmes spent in Low Income Countries in the last financial year rose to 71 per cent. from 63.2 per cent. the previous year. We are on course to reach a proportion of around 80 per cent. this year.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Export Licences

Mr. Berry: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in what circumstances an item on the military list can be exported without the requirement of an end-use certificate. [120236]

Dr. Howells: All applications for Standard Individual Export Licences (SIELs) for the permanent export of goods subject to strategic export control must be supported by appropriate end-user documentation. Where the intended consignee is a Government body, and the application is not for a licence to export chemicals listed in Schedule 2 or 3 to the Chemical Weapons Convention (CWC) to a state which has not ratified the CWC, a copy of the official Government purchase order or a copy of the relevant part of the Government contract covering the order is normally sufficient. An end-user undertaking is not usually required for Standard Individual Export Licence (SIEL) applications for the temporary export of goods subject to strategic export control.

An Open Individual Export Licence (OIEL) is specific to an individual exporter and covers multiple shipments of specified goods to specified destinations and/or, in some cases, specified consignees. The exporter must obtain from each consignee an appropriate written undertaking for each export before the export takes place, or not later than one month after the date of exportation. Where the exporter intends to make more than one exportation to the same consignee in any period of one year, an annual written undertaking may be obtained in fulfilment of this requirement.

As with SIELs, where goods are being consigned direct to a Government body, we will normally accept a copy of the Government purchase contract order, or the relevant extracts from the contract.

An Open General Export Licence (OGEL) allows the export from the UK of goods specified in the goods coverage of the OGEL to specified destinations. In such circumstances, end-user undertakings are not required. Copies of OGELs are routinely placed in the Library of the House.

Birth Certificates

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry for what purposes his Department requires a birth certificate to be furnished by (a) employees, (b) contractors, (c) those applying for employment and contracts and (d) other persons. [120312]

Dr. Howells: In the DTI and some of its agencies a birth certificate is one of a variety of documents which applicants for jobs may choose to offer as proof of identity and of age, for pension purposes, prior to or at recruitment. In the event of the death of a departmental employee in service, his or her children's full birth certificates are required in order to verify dates of birth for dependants' benefits under the relevant pensions arrangements. Contractors are responsible for establishing proof of the identity of their employees. Birth certificates are not required routinely for any other departmental purposes, although they can be offered by claimants under the Empty Property Compensation Scheme to help establish the validity of such claims in particular lines of inheritance, and they may, in very limited circumstances, be demanded under a number of statutory powers of investigation, for example under Section 434 of the Companies Act 1985.

BNFL

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will instruct the Health and Safety Executive to conduct an investigation into quality control data problems associated with MOX fuel supplied by British Nuclear Fuels to Swiss and German utilities. [119674]

Mrs. Liddell: No. The Health and Safety Executive's (HSE) Nuclear Installations Inspectorate reported on the data falsification issues in the MOX demonstration facility (MDF) in its report published on 18 February. HSE's priority now is to assess BNFL's responses to its reports, published on 18 April, and to monitor the implementation of BNFL's action plans.

I understand that HSE has briefed the Swiss and German nuclear regulators on the findings of their report.

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to investigate further allegations made by Mitsubishi Heavy Industries about BNFL's ability to manufacture MOX fuel pellets to meet the required specification; and if he will make a statement. [119680]

Mrs. Liddell: I am not aware of the allegations made by Mitsubishi Heavy Industries apart from those relating to the falsification of data on secondary pellet diameter checks.

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if MOX fuel pellets which should have failed the secondary checks at the Sellafield MOX Demonstration Facility were erroneously approved. [119679]

Mrs. Liddell: The falsification of data occurred at a secondary manual stage of checking, the fuel pellets already having been subject to 100 per cent. automated checking.

The Health and Safety Executive's (HSE) Nuclear Installations Inspectorate reported on the data falsification issues in the MOX Demonstration Facility (MDF) in its report published on 18 February. The report confirmed that some pellet diameter data had been falsified; four of the affected fuel assemblies are in Japan; and the fuel would be safe in use.

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has received a copy of an English translation of a report by the TUEV agency produced for the Ministry of Environment of the Government of Lower Saxony on MOX production and quality control standards at Sellafield. [119673]

Mrs. Liddell: I have not received a copy of the report.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will list each of the (a) oral and (b) written parliamentary answers Ministers in his Department have provided since May 1997 which were based on (i) information and (ii) a draft provided by British Nuclear Fuels; [120046]

(2) how many letters have been sent by Ministers in his Department to (a) hon. Members, (b) Members of the House of Lords and (c) foreign parliamentarians since May 1997, which were drafted (i) in full and (ii) in part by British Nuclear Fuels. [120050]

Mrs. Liddell: Internal advice and the source of such advice is not made public in line with exemption 2 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will appoint to the board of British Nuclear Fuels a suitably qualified representative from a non-governmental organisation. [120282]

Mrs. Liddell: The BNFL Chairman, Hugh Collum, is looking to refresh and strengthen his board so that the company can tackle the challenges ahead. That will include recruiting people of a high calibre with a proven track record to contribute, and be committed, to the success of the business.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will instruct British Nuclear Fuels to replace Lloyds Register Quality Assurance Ltd. as quality verifiers of BNFL activities. [120248]

Mrs. Liddell: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) on 28 March 2000, Official Report, column 105W.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make it his policy in answering questions from hon. Members to indicate where British Nuclear Fuels helped to draft the reply. [120304]

Mrs. Liddell: Internal advice and the source of such advice is not made public in line with exemption 2 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the (a) safety management and (b) quality control matters that remain to be addressed by British Nuclear Fuels which were mentioned in the two BNFL reports on 18 April. [120247]

Mrs. Liddell: The BNFL reports published on 18 April included action plans to address each of the 43 recommendations in the two HSE reports on MOX fuel data falsification and on the control and supervision of operations at Sellafield. These action plans show that a number of HSE's recommendations have already been addressed and there are deadlines against each one that BNFL has still to complete. While the HSE has indicated that BNFL's responses provide a good foundation to deliver the necessary safety improvements at Sellafield, it has said that it will be monitoring BNFL's implementation of the action plans and that it will not hesitate to use its enforcement powers if it sees any signs of significant failure by BNFL to deliver on its commitments. Copies of two BNFL reports are available on BNFL's web site at www.bnfl.co.uk.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the reason for the delay in BNFL's response to the report issued on 18 February by the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate on the storage of liquid high level waste at BNFL, Sellafield. [120250]

Mrs. Liddell: There has been no delay. The Health and Safety Executive (HSE) report on the storage of liquid high-level waste at Sellafield set no deadline. HSE has agreed with BNFL that the company should respond by the summer.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he was consulted by BNFL in respect of the new management and board member appointees announced by the company on 18 April. [120249]

Mrs. Liddell: I was consulted about the board changes which the company announced on 18 April.

Power Plants

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information his Department collects on (a) gas-fired and (b) combined heat and power plants, and on planning applications made for such plants in (i) England and (ii) Wales. [120051]

Mrs. Liddell: In relation to any new power station with a capacity of more than 50 megawatts (whether gas fired or combined heat and power plant), the Secretary of State's consent is required under section 36 of the Electricity Act 1989. If, having followed the procedures set out in the Electricity Act, the Secretary of State decides to grant consent, planning permission is deemed to be granted under section 90 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990. All applications have to provide information as required under the Electricity and Pipeline Works (Assessment of Environmental Effects) Regulations 1990.

Stations with a capacity of more than 10 MW which are fuelled by natural gas require approval under section 14 of the Energy Act 1976 and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry will be supplied with factual information for him to form a judgment as to whether energy policy clearance should be given.

Decisions under both the Electricity Act and the Energy Act are announced by way of Parliamentary Answer, Press Notice and informing interested parties direct.

The Digest of United Kingdom Energy Statistics, copies of which are available in the Library of the House, is published annually and contains a chapter on combined heat and power. The Digest for 2000 is due to be published at the end of July and will give annual data on capacity, fuel and output from combined heat and power schemes in the UK for 1999 and earlier years. The Digest also contains a chapter on electricity which gives the latest statistics on the total generating capacity of gas-fired stations, the volume of gas used for generation, and electricity generated and supplied by gas fired stations.

Gas Industry

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he intends to reopen the application of the gas-fired power station proposals which he refused as a result of the stricter consent policy; [120116]

(2) what his policy is regarding granting permission to construct gas-fired power stations under section 36 of the Electricity Act 1989. [120115]

Mrs. Liddell: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry announced on 17 April that he intends to lift the stricter consents policy as soon as the new electricity trading arrangements are in place, which he expects to be by October this year. The lifting of the stricter consents policy will mean that the existing presumption against new gas-fired power generation will no longer apply. The initiative for proposals for new power stations will remain with private sector companies to consider, to meet the evolving needs of the energy market. That market will be influenced by measures such as exemption from the climate change levy for CHP and enhanced capital allowances. It will also be influenced by the implementation of the Integrated Pollution Prevention Control (IPPC) Directive which emphasises that installations are operated in such a way that energy is used efficiently, and by the draft Large Combustion Plants Directive, which if adopted in its present form will require the technical and economic feasibility of providing for the combined generation of heat and power to be examined.

The Government strongly support CHP and, consistent with the above measures, will expect developers to be able to show that they have explored opportunities to use CHP, providing heat for business and the community, although it is recognised that that may not always be practical. The Department will be discussing with developers the information which needs to be submitted as part of the notification under section 14 of the Energy Act and applications under section 36 of the Electricity Act.

The Department will also be contacting the promoters of the 15 proposals put on hold since October 1998, with a view to seeing whether those developers wish to proceed with their proposals and what updating of information is required of them.

Until the stricter consents policy is lifted, it will continue to play a part in the energy market.

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment his Department has made of the likely future reserves of North Sea gas, taking into account the proposal to lift the stricter current policy from October. [120108]

Mrs. Liddell: The Department of Trade and Industry publishes estimates of remaining recoverable reserves of gas on the UK Continental Shelf (UKCS) in its annual "Brown Book", the next edition of which is due for publication in May 2000. The UKCS includes the Irish Sea and Atlantic Margin as well as the North Sea. The lower and upper ends of the ranges of the Department's estimates of remaining recoverable reserves of natural gas, in billion cubic metres, at the end of 1999 are given in the table in cubic metres:

Discovered	760	1,755
Undiscovered[1]	355	1,465

[1] "Yet-to-find"

The impact on remaining recoverable reserves of the proposed lifting of the stricter consents policy from October 2000 is not likely to be significant. Higher demand for gas could advance the pace of reserve depletion or it could increase the reserve base if it leads to an increase in exploration activity.

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when Britain will become a net importer of natural gas. [120107]

Mrs. Liddell: The date on which the UK will revert to being a net importer of natural gas will depend on a number of variables, such as the timing of commencement and cessation of production from particular fields and the rate of growth of demand (which can influence the pace of exploration and development of discoveries). It is likely that the UK will again become a net importer of gas during the present decade. There is, however, infrastructure in place to permit imports as and when they are needed.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what legal advice he received concerning the legality of imposing a moratorium on gas-fired power stations; [120183]

(2) when the Government changed its moratorium on new gas-fired power stations to a strict consents policy. [120493]

Mr. Byers: None. No moratorium has been imposed.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will estimate how much coal capacity is lost for each additional 1MW of gas-fired electricity generation, assuming electricity demand and the import level stay the same. [120184]

Mr. Byers: I refer the right hon. Member to my reply on 25 May 1999, Official Report, column 109W.

Coal Division

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry for what reason two officials have recently been moved from his Department's Coal Division. [120358]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 2 May 2000]: All changes reflect normal career moves.

Patent Office

Ms Christine Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about the quinquennial review of the Patent Office. [120982]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The Government are committed to achieving better public services that are of higher quality and are more responsive to the needs of the people who use them. The services and functions provided by Executive Agencies and non-Departmental Public Bodies (NDPBs) are at the heart of this programme of continuous improvement and their effective delivery is a key element in the success of Modernising Government. Regular Agency and NDPB reviews are an important element in ensuring that we have in place the right structures to deliver the Government's agenda effectively and to provide a strong focus on improving their future performance.

The Quinquennial Review of the Patent Office, which forms part of that programme of review and continuous improvement, was launched on 27 April. Its terms of reference are:

To consider and to make recommendations regarding:

First, the organisational status which would be most appropriate for the policy work and operation of the Patent Office in the future, taking into account its contribution to the objectives of the Department and of the Government as a whole, including the Modernising Government agenda, developments in the national and international legislative, regulatory and commercial environment, and the views of customers, staff, consumers and other interested parties; and

Second, whether any changes should be made to the way in which the Patent Office operates, including its aims and objectives, targets and financial controls; the scope of the activities undertaken; and whether its activities could be done more effectively.

The review is to be undertaken in accordance with the latest Cabinet Office guidance, published in January 2000.

The Review will be carried out by officials in the Department of Trade and Industry, with specialist advice as appropriate. The Review Team will report to a Steering Group which will include two independent members and be chaired by Dr. Catherine Bell, the Director General of Corporate and Consumer Affairs. The aim will be to complete each stage of the review within three months, as recommended in the Cabinet Office guidance.

As indicated in the terms of reference, the Review Team is seeking the views of interested parties. A consultation paper is available from:

Wind Energy

Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on his Department's policy on offshore wind farms. [120226]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 2 May 2000]: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Thomas) today.

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what actions are being taken to promote the development of a UK manufacturing, supply, installation and maintenance industry relating to wind energy, with particular reference to offshore wind energy; and if he will make a statement. [119923]

Mrs. Liddell: Support provided under the Non-Fossil Fuel Obligation (NFFO), the Scottish Renewables Obligation (SRO), and my Department's research and development programme for renewable energy has contributed to the development of the wind industry. The first two UK offshore wind turbines are to be installed this year and developers are now looking to see how wind energy can be deployed more widely offshore.

The Government are taking powers in the Utilities Bill currently before Parliament to promote the development of renewable energy through a new Obligation on electricity suppliers. The intention is that this would include both onshore and offshore wind and would create a market for renewable energy until 2025. Support under existing NFFO and SRO contracts will be maintained. There will be no new rounds of NFFO and SRO contracts

The Government are also looking at the possibility of some limited additional support for offshore wind and energy crops. However, Government acting alone will not be sufficient to meet the challenge ahead and industry is expected to play an important part.

Marine Renewable Energies

Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent discussions he has had with offshore engineering companies on marine renewable energies. [120224]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 2 May 2000]: I have frequent contact with representatives of the oil and gas companies, for example in chairing the PILOT initiative. Matters covered in discussions include opportunities for diversification in the companies' offshore activities.

Congo

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent representations he has received concerning (a) British pilots and (b) air charter service air cargo companies supplying weapons to both sides in the civil war in the Democratic Republic of Congo. [120267]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 2 May 2000]: The answer is as follows:

(a) None and (b) none.

Miners' Pension Fund

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many representations he has received calling for a review of the arrangements for the distribution of surpluses from the miners' pension funds between Government and miners, and from whom. [120357]

Mrs. Liddell: I have received in the region of 160 representations on this issue. These have come from a range of parties including local authorities, Members of Parliament and private individuals.

Bronchitis and Emphysema (Test Centres)

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects the second test centre for claimants for compensation for chronic bronchitis and emphysema to be established in Durham; and if he will make a statement. [120399]

Mrs. Liddell: There is currently a spirometry test centre based at the Miners Offices in Durham City. The centre is fully resourced and equipped to perform assessments for the Medical Assessment Process. There are no plans at present to open a second centre in Durham. The situation will be kept under review.

Rover/BMW

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what communications he has received from Mr. Towers concerning the timing of his final bid to BMW. [120495]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 2 May 2000]: Mr. Towers is now in negotiations with BMW. I shall be meeting him in due course.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of whether public money would be needed for the Towers consortium to outbid Alchemy Partners for Longbridge. [120494]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 2 May 2000]: No request for public money has been received from the Towers consortium.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Regional Offices

Mr. Breed: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent representations he has received regarding the proposed restructuring of his Department's regional offices; and from which organisations. [120405]

Mr. Morley: The Department has received a number of representations about the future of the Ministry's Regional Service Centres following the recent review of CAP scheme administration. The majority of representations have been from, or on behalf of, staff of the RSCs.

Mr. Breed: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what models for restructuring regional offices he has considered; and if he will make a statement; [120403]

(2) what plans he has to restructure his Department's regional offices; and if he will make a statement. [120404]

Mr. Morley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given on 27 March 2000, Official Report, column 37W, by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State to the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) which sets out the latest position.

Live Animal Exports

Mr. Prosser: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 1 March 2000, Official Report, column 286W, on live animal exports, from which counties in England and Wales the sheep removed from consignments of slaughter/further fattening sheep in 1999 by his staff at Dover port originated; and how many originated from each of those counties. [120077]

Mr. Morley: The counties in England and Wales from which animals removed from consignments of slaughter/further fattening sheep by staff at Dover port in 1999 started their journeys, and the total number of animals starting their journeys in those counties were:

County	Total sheep	Unfit sheep	Dead sheep	Removed for other reasons
Hereford	65,257	2	6	26
Kent	688,364	49	0	17
North Yorkshire	57,111	1	2	87
Somerset	597	1	0	0
Worcester	2,904	3	0	0
Denbighshire	157,182	16	4	0
Powys	73,406	6	2	0
Wrexham	40,827	1	0	0
Other counties in England and Wales	16,254	0	0	0
Journeys starting outside of England and Wales	13,181	3	1	30
Total	1,115,083	82	15	160

Marine Animals (Nets)

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he will bring forward proposals to reduce the number of (a) porpoises and (b) other marine animals caught in nets, as required by the 1992 European Habitats Directive; and if he will make a statement. [118827]

Mr. Morley: Under the provisions of the EC Habitats Directive, the UK has an obligation to monitor the incidental capture of Annexe IV (a) species (which include all cetaceans) and take further research and conservation measures, as required, to ensure this capture does not have a significant detrimental impact on these species.

My Department has been monitoring the incidental capture of cetaceans through a number of research contracts with the Sea Mammal Research Unit. In addition, a number of mitigation measures are currently being trialled with a view to reducing marine mammal bycatch generally. If these prove effective, the UK industry will be encouraged to adopt them. Furthermore, if appropriate, the European Commission will be approached, with a view to them being applied at Community level.

The UK Government, in consultation with environmental NGOs, have also prepared a draft strategy on the protection of the harbour porpoise in UK waters. The aim of this strategy is to address the potential decline in numbers of this species. It is anticipated that the document will be published by DETR in the near future, with a view to it being submitted to the Agreement on the Conservation of Small Cetaceans of the Baltic and North Seas (ASCOBANS) Meeting of Parties in Bristol in July.

English Rural Development Plan

Mr. Breed: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food who will administer the English Rural Development Plan at the regional level. [119006]

Mr. Morley: The Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is the competent authority designated by the member state with overall responsibility for administering the England Rural Development Plan. At regional level, Regional Programming Groups involving partners from Government Departments and agencies will oversee the implementation and administration of the Programme. A full description of the proposed administrative arrangements is available in Section 12 and Annexe IX of the Plan.

BSE

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the studies on the presence of the BSE infective agent in cattle (a) under 30 months of age and (b) older than 30 months. [119036]

Ms Quin: Between January and March 1999, brain tissue was collected from approximately 4,163 randomly selected cattle, over five-years-old, passing through the Over Thirty Month Scheme (OTMS) and examined for the presence of BSE infection. The purpose of the study was to assess if cattle carry any detectable BSE infection before clinical symptoms are seen.

Of the brains removed, a total of 3,951 were in a suitable condition for examination and initial results showed that 18 cattle had signs of BSE infection. The remaining 3,933 were negative and showed no signs of infection. Taken in isolation these results could indicate that approximately 0.5 per cent. of the remaining cattle over five years and older may be infected. It will not be possible fully to interpret the data until the results from other diagnostic tests and a statistical analysis of the age structure of cattle slaughtered under the OTM Scheme is complete.

A similar study of cattle under thirty months of age has not been undertaken because it would be very unlikely that brain pathology would have developed in such young animals if they were infected. In experimental conditions when calves were orally challenged with relatively high doses of BSE infected cattle brain, the first stage at which signs of BSE infection could be detected in the brains of these challenged cattle was at 32 months after dosing. No signs were seen prior to this at 26 months post challenge.

Harbour Grant Scheme

Mr. Moss: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which of the projects under the harbour grant scheme which had formal approval in May 1999 have been granted their grant allocation; and which of the projects in respect of which only applications had been submitted at that date, (a) have been allocated grant and (b) are being processed. [118828]

Mr. Morley: Of the 10 applications for harbour grant which were formally approved to receive grant at 21 May 1999:

projects at Amble, Hartlepool, Mevagissey, Polperro and Scarborough (two projects) are now complete and have received their grant in full; projects at Cadgwith Cove, Grimsby, Scarborough and Whitby have so far received part payments.

Of the 22 projects in respect of which applications had been submitted at 21 May 1999:

projects at Bridlington, Grimsby, Mevagissey, Padstow and Whitehaven have since been given formal approval to receive grant; projects at Amble, Brixham, Gosport, Hull, Leigh on Sea, Looe, Margate, Newhaven, Newlyn, Poole (two projects), Port Isaac, West Bay and Yarmouth are still under consideration.

Since the closure of the scheme on 21 May 1999 the applications for projects at Calshot, Hole Haven and Langstone have been withdrawn by their sponsors.

Waste Incineration

Mr. Stunell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he received on the draft EU Directive, Air Pollution: Incineration of Waste (Merging with Directive 94/67/EC Hazardous Waste), prior to its adoption; and if he will make a statement. [119676]

Mr. Morley: I have received representations on this Directive, for which DETR has responsibility, from the National Pig Association, the Countryside Alliance, the National Farmers Union, a veterinary clinic, three companies and 15 private individuals. The Directive has not yet been adopted.

Fisheries

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his policy on the continued use of fisheries regulation 3760/92 after 2002. [119701]

Mr. Morley: Council Regulation 3760/92 is the basic framework regulation for the Common Fisheries Policy (CFP) and is due to be reviewed before the end of 2002. The Government are seeking to maintain highly valued features of the present arrangements, such as the national quota system based on relative stability and restrictions on access within national 6 and 12 mile limits, and believe that this will be achieved. At the same time, we will want to explore opportunities to improve the CFP to make it a more effective instrument for conserving fish stocks.

GM Crops

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish the results of the GM trials involving grainseed; and if he will make a statement. [119785]

Ms Quin [holding answer 20 April 2000]: The results of the GM trials supporting the proposed National Listing of Chardon LL are publicly available, and copies have been placed in the Library of the House. The Grainseed Ltd. data relate to those columns headed "Ches" (Cheshire).

TREASURY

Energy (Domestic Users)

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the recent studies (a) undertaken, (b) commissioned and (c) reviewed by his Department that assess the elasticity of demand of domestic users of energy with respect to the price they pay; and if he will make a statement. [120413]

Mr. Timms: "Energy Projections for the UK, Working Paper, March 2000", made available by the Department for Trade and Industry alongside the Government's draft Climate Change Programme, implicitly includes within its projections updated estimates of the price elasticities of demand for domestic fuels. Previous to this, the Institute for Fiscal Studies produced a working paper for Customs and Excise titled "The Simulation of Indirect Tax Reforms: The IFS Simulation Program for Indirect Taxation (SPIT)" which also looked at the elasticity of demand for domestic fuel and power.

Labour Market Data

Mr. Fallon: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the pre-release recipients of labour market data from the Office for National Statistics. [120228]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 2 May 2000]: In accordance with long-standing practice, this information is provided to a tightly restricted group of officials on a strict "need-to-know" basis.

MEP Pensions

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the cost to his Department of funding the pensions of Members of the European Parliament in each of the last three years; to how many beneficiaries these payments are made; and what estimate he has made of the future annual liability for making such pension payments. [119585]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Expenditure on pensions is met from the EC budget.

Sustainable Development

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if it is the Government's policy that each Government Department should give equal priority to promoting social progress, effective protection of the environment, the prudent use of natural resources and the maintenance of high and stable levels of growth in the second comprehensive spending review; how many times the Chairman of the Green Ministers Group has met the Chief Secretary to the Treasury to discuss integrating sustainable development in the second comprehensive spending review; how many of the draft public service agreements submitted to the Treasury explicitly refer to the promotion of sustainable development; and if he will make a statement. [119784]

Mr. Andrew Smith: At the start of the Spending Review last autumn, sustainable development was identified as a common issue for all Departments to take into account when drawing up their spending proposals. The Government's approach to sustainable development is set out in "A Better Quality of Life", published in May 1999.

The Treasury asked that Green Ministers in Departments be closely involved in the preparation and conduct of Departmental contributions to the Review, to ensure that proper consideration is given to sustainable development issues. All Departments have now made their submissions, and the Treasury is assessing them to determine the extent to which further work is needed. Significant points are included in my Spending Review meetings with colleagues.

The Financial Secretary acts as the Green Minister for the Chancellor's departments and as such attends Green Ministers meetings with the Chairman of that Group.

Single Flights

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the taxable position of single flights (a) from and (b) to regions designated in section 19 of the Finance Bill. [120629]

Mr. Timms [holding answer 2 May 2000]: The effect of Clause 19 will be that passengers on flights from airports in the Scottish Highlands and Islands will be relieved of air passenger duty. Flights to the Scottish Highlands and Islands from other parts of the UK will not be covered by the exemption. However, the provisions of Clause 18 will mean that the duty on economy flights to the Scottish Highlands and Island will be halved to £5 while the duty on non-economy flights will remain at £10. Flights between airports in this region will be entirely exempt from duty.

National Insurance

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to increase the level of interest paid on backdated national insurance contribution rebates. [119940]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 20 April 2000]: The Department has paid, automatically, an additional 0.5 per cent. for each month of delay beyond October 1998. These payments are continuing, with Age Related Rebate payments due to be paid on 2 May 2000, increased by 9.5 per cent.

The Department's compensation scheme is regularly reviewed and any changes to current arrangements will be published in the normal way.

Region (Definition)

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his definition of "region" as used in section 19 of the Finance Bill; and how this relates to local government area and ward boundaries. [120628]

Mr. Timms [holding answer 2 May 2000]: Clause 19 introduces a provision which will allow passengers on flights from airports in certain regions to be exempt from Air Passenger Duty (APD). The regions will be defined by Treasury Order and it is the Government's intention that the order will name the Scottish Highlands and Islands. This region includes the local authority areas of Orkney, Shetland, Western Isles, Highland, Argyll and Bute, part of North Ayrshire and part of Moray.

Climate Change Levy

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what provision he has made to take account of the anti-competitive impact of relief from climate change taxes or levies made by environmental ministries in other EU countries as applied to gas companies. [120100]

Mr. Timms: The Government have sought to design the climate change levy in a way that maximises its environmental effectiveness while protecting the competitiveness of UK firms. This has involved taking into account developments in other EU countries.

In total, seven European Union countries have introduced carbon or energy taxes since 1990. The European Commission considers compliance with state aids rules for any reliefs from these taxes.

On current projections, most OECD countries will need to introduce new measures of one form or another if they are to meet their Kyoto targets for reducing greenhouse gas emissions.

Educational Qualifications

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many of those in (a) 1980 and (b) 1999 in the lower quartile of earners had no educational qualifications. [120665]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from John Pullinger to Mr. Gerald Howarth, dated May 2000:

The Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS) has been asked to reply to your recent question on the number of people in the lower quartile of earners who had no educational qualifications. I am replying in the Director's absence.

The Labour Force Survey (LFS) is the ONS's main source of labour market data on individuals. It can provide information on the earnings and qualifications of employees. However, no LFS data on earnings are available prior to winter (December-February) 1992/3.

In Great Britain in autumn (September to November) 1993, 1,611,000 employees aged 16 and over in the lower quartile earnings group (based on gross weekly earnings) had no qualifications. This was 30.2 per cent. of all employees aged 16 and over in this earnings group. In autumn 1999, the corresponding figures were 1,140,000 and 91.4 per cent. The figures are not seasonally adjusted.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many of the long-term unemployed in (a) 1970, (b) 1980 and (c) 1999 had no educational qualifications. [120666]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from John Pullinger to Mr. Gerald Howarth, dated 3 May 2000:

The Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS) has been asked to reply to your recent question on long-term unemployed people with no educational qualifications. I am replying in the Director's absence.

Estimates of economic status and educational qualifications are available from the Labour Force Survey (LFS). Non-seasonally adjusted estimates from the spring (March-May) 1999 quarter for the UK show that 33 per cent. (170 thousand) of long-term unemployed people of working age had no educational qualifications. This compares with 59 per cent. (882 thousand) in the same period in 1984 (the earliest date for which a comparable estimate can be provided.).

The measure of unemployment derived from the LFS is defined on a consistent and internationally recognised basis set out by the International Labour Organisation (ILO). It counts as unemployed people who are a) without a paid job, b) available to start work within the next two weeks and c) have either looked for work in the last four weeks or are waiting to start a job already obtained. Long-term unemployed are those who have been ILO unemployed for one year or more.

Teenage Suicides

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many teenage suicides there were in (a) 1970, (b) 1980 and (c) 1999; and what percentage of teenage suicides occurred in homes at a time when (i) one parent and (ii) both parents were present. [120663]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from John Pullinger to Mr. Gerald Howarth, dated 3 May 2000:

The Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS) has been asked to reply to your recent question on teenage suicides in (a) 1970, (b) 1980 and (c) 1999; and the percentage of teenage suicides occurring in homes at a time when (i) one parent and (ii) both parents were present. I am replying in the Director's absence.

Figures for the number of suicides for 1970, 1980 and 1998, the latest year for which figures are currently available, are given in the attached table.

For adult deaths our usual practice is to define suicides as including both suicides and deaths from injury and poisoning undetermined whether accidentally or purposely inflicted. It is likely that most undetermined deaths (open verdicts) among adults are cases where the harm was self-inflicted but there was insufficient evidence to prove that the deceased deliberately intended to commit suicide. This is not necessarily the case for children and the categories are therefore separately presented here.

Information is routinely collected on the place of death, but not on the place of occurrence of the suicide attempt. In many cases where the initial attempt was at home, the patient would ultimately die in hospital. Any statistics on suicide deaths at home would therefore understate the real level. Information on persons present at a death is not routinely recorded.

Suicide and undetermined injury deaths for teenagers (ages 13 to 19), England and Wales

	1970	1980	1998
Suicide and self inflicted injury[1]	79	126	110
Injury undetermined whether accidentally or purposely inflicted[2]	31	62	81

Family Statistics

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the average fall in income arising from divorce for a divorced (a) father and (b) mother with their children in (i) 1980 and (ii) 1999. [120661]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from John Pullinger to Mr. Gerald Howarth, dated 3 May 2000:

The Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS) has been asked to reply to your recent question asking for an estimate of the average fall in income arising from divorce for a divorced (a) father and (b) mother with their children in (i) 1980 and (ii) 1999. I am replying in the Director's absence.

The ONS does not make estimates of this kind. One non-government source that allows this type of analysis is the British Household Panel Study, funded by the Economic and Social Research Council (ESRC). This survey has followed a sample of households each year since 1991 and has information about the incomes and marital status of household members in each of these years. The Institute for Social and Economic Research (ISER, formerly the ESRC Research Centre on Micro-Social Change) published an analysis showing the effect of marital splits on income between 1991 and 1994. This was published in 1997 as 'Marital splits and income changes: evidence for Britain' (Working Paper 97–4). You can obtain a copy from the information officer at the ISER, tel: 01206 872938.

Divorce

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many of (a) the total unemployed and (b) the long-term unemployed in (i) 1970, (ii) 1980 and (iii) 1999 were divorced. [120667]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from John Pullinger to Mr. Gerald Howarth, dated 3 May 2000:

The Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS) has been asked to reply to your recent question on the numbers of unemployed people with were divorced. I am replying in the Director's absence.

Estimates of economic and marital status are available from the Labour Force Survey (LFS). The table gives non-seasonally adjusted LFS estimates of the unemployed who were divorced in the spring (March-May) quarter of 1999 and the same period in 1984 (the earliest date for which a comparable estimate can be provided).

The measure of unemployment derived from the LFS is defined on a consistent and internationally recognised basis set out by the International Labour Organisation (ILO). It counts as unemployed people who are a) without a paid job, b) available to start work within the next two weeks and c) have either looked for work in the last four weeks or are waiting to start a job already obtained. Long-term unemployed are those who have been ILO unemployed for one year or more.

Divorced persons by length of ILO unemployment UK, 1999 and 1984, Spring (March to May) of each year

	All persons (000)	Divorced persons (000)	Divorced (%)
1999
All ILO Unemployed	1,752	170	10
Unemployed one year or more	522	68	13

HOME DEPARTMENT

Animal Experiments

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if tobacco smoke is used as an agent in research on animals under the Animals Scientific Procedures Act 1986; and if he will make a statement. [119718]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Government stand firmly by their ban on the testing of tobacco products announced in November 1997. There will be no approval for any such tests.

Two recently approved applications are for programmes that do not test the effects of tobacco smoke, which are already widely known, but enable the development of treatments for chronic obstructive pulmonary diseases such as bronchitis and emphysema which seriously debilitate many people. These health problems derive mainly from smoking, including passive smoking, as well as occupation-related lung diseases, such as those caused by the inhalation of coal dust. Tobacco smoke is the only test material to model reliably the effects that will enable a better understanding of the disease processes and improved medical treatments. The licensed research programmes are to investigate medical treatments, not the safety of tobacco products.

The Inspectorate and the Animal Procedures Committee have advised that the licences are justifiable and that the benefits to man and animals would outweigh the costs to the animals involved. As with all project licence applications, these two licences were issued only after a full and careful assessment including whether there were alternatives which replace animal use, reduce the number of animals needed or refine the experimental design to minimise suffering.

Cannabis

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the total number of (a) convictions and (b) police cautions for possession of cannabis in each year since 1980. [119921]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The information requested for the period 1980 to 1998, the latest year for which figures are currently available, is given in the table. Separate breakdowns are not available for cautions and convictions prior to 1982.

Stop and Search

Ms Buck: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the breakdown was by percentage of stop and searches for each police borough in the Metropolitan police area under section 1 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 by (a) ethnic appearance and (b) reason for search, in 1998–99. [119830]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis has provided the information requested which I have placed in the Library.

These statistics update those published by the Home Office, under section 95 of the Criminal Justice Act 1991, in 'Statistics on Race and the Criminal Justice System', in December 1999.

Prisoners (Progressive Moves)

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what date Quayyum Raja, currently detained at HMP Long Lartin, was convicted; what was his sentence; how long he has been detained at Long Lartin; and when he is due to be released. [120035]

Mr. Boateng: Quayyum Raja was sentenced to life imprisonment on 7 February 1985. He was given a tariff of 25 years which expires on 1 February 2009. His readiness for release or transfer to open conditions will be considered by the Parole Board for the first time in 2006. He has been detained at Long Lartin prison since 17 February 1992.

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners detained at HMP Long Lartin were offered progressive moves to other prisons in each of the last three years, and in the current year to date, and of those how many (a) accepted and (b) declined the transfer; and of those who declined the transfer, how many were placed in segregation. [120004]

Mr. Boateng: This information is not readily available and cannot be provided in the form requested except at disproportionate cost. It is known, however, that during the last 30 months Long Lartin prison has offered progressive moves to approximately 50 category B life sentence prisoners.

A minority of prisoners do indicate a reluctance to comply with initial transfer instructions, but in almost all cases do move following representations to Prison Service headquarters.

Prisoners are not placed in segregation for refusing a progressive move.

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if prisoners who undertake a progressive move normally become eligible for home leave or parole prior to release. [120036]

Mr. Boateng: Life sentence prisoners become eligible for escorted absences to towns near their establishments after having completed six months in category C conditions. They are not eligible for any form of unsupervised home leave or any other form of temporary release until they have reached open conditions.

All prisoners sentenced to determinate sentences of four years or more are eligible to be considered for parole once they reach the halfway point of their sentence. Moves between prisons and recategorisation do not affect their eligibility for parole.

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department for what reason Mr. Quayyum Raja was placed in segregation at HMP Long Lartin after refusing a progressive move to HMP Swaleside; and whether (a) he and (b) his officials were informed of this prior to the segregation taking place. [120037]

Mr. Boateng: Mr. Quayyum Raja has never been placed in segregation as a result of refusing a progressive move from Long Lartin to Swaleside prison.

Mr. Raja's refusal to move to Swaleside was in contravention of his sentence plan, a crucial part of his progress towards eventual release. This led to him being downgraded to basic level on the Prison Service incentives and earned privileges scheme and moved to the basic regime wing at Long Lartin prison.

The Prison Service has now re-considered Mr. Raja's case in the light of recent changes in the availability of accommodation at Gartree prison and Mr. Raja has now accepted a move to Gartree.

Black Box Recorders

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the Metropolitan police expects to install black box recorders in its police vehicles; and if he will make a statement. [120000]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Commissioner of the Police of the Metropolis has informed me that the tendering process for the supply of black box recorders for police vehicles is under way and it is hoped that a contract will be awarded shortly. A phased installation programme will then take place.

Illegal Drugs (Lancashire)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many convictions there were in Lancashire in each year since 1995 for (a) offering to supply or supplying and (b) possessing (i) cannabis and (ii) ecstasy. [119848]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The information requested for the period 1995 to 1998, the latest year for which figures are currently available, is given in the table.

Convictions in Lancashire for supply and possession of cannabis and ecstasy, 1995–98

	1995	1996	1997	1998

Cannabis	56	53	49	67
Ecstasy	10	17	15	9
Possession
Cannabis	678	720	1,010	1,338
Ecstasy	38	49	38	25

Note:
Offering to supply and supply of drugs are both caught by Section 4(3) of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 and are not differentiated for statistical purposes.

Lord Archer

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the estimated cost to date of the Metropolitan police investigation into the allegations of perjury made against Lord Archer of Weston-Super-Mare. [120001]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis has informed me that up to 19 April, the staffing cost of the Organised Crime Group investigation into allegations of perjury made against Lord Archer is approximately £31,000.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications for political asylum in the UK in 1999 were (a) approved and (b) refused. [119280]

Mrs. Roche: The information requested is given in the table. The latest information on asylum is available on the Home Office internet site at http://www.homeoffice.gov.uk/rds/index.htm. This information is updated on a monthly basis.

[8] Cases decided under pragmatic measures aimed at reducing the pre 1996 asylum application backlog.
[9] Includes a small number of cases where asylum has been granted.
[10] Includes a small number of cases where the application has been refused on substantive grounds.
Notes:
1. Decision figures for January to March 1999 are low due to significant interruption to the casework operation during the transition of IND staff to Integrated Caseworking. This interruption also effects a small proportion of in-country applications in January 1999 which have been estimated.
2. Port figures for January 1999 are estimated and subject to revision.

Probation

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average length of time from breach of a probation condition to the offender's appearance in court for each probation service in England and Wales in the last 12 months for which figures are available. [120191]

Mr. Boateng: There is currently no centrally held data on this. We are trying to ascertain the national picture and are in the process of obtaining information which may provide an indication of the average time lapse between the service instigating breach action with the court and the breach sentence hearing. The results are not yet available, but I will write to the hon. Member as soon as the position is clearer.

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many unexecuted warrants for the arrest of offenders in breach of probation conditions are held by each police force in England and Wales. [120192]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The information requested is not available centrally. However, the Government are concerned that warrants in respect of breaches of community sentences should be executed as soon as possible, and we are currently undertaking some research to determine the current position. I shall write to the hon. Member when the results are available.

Special Constables (Ethnic Minorities)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) men and (b) women from ethnic minority communities living within Greater London were special constables on 1 April. [120071]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis informs me that on 1 April 2000, 92 men and 28 women from ethnic minority communities were serving as special constables with the Metropolitan police.

Passports

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many foreign passports the Passport Office holds which are currently unaccounted for. [120119]

Mrs. Roche: The Immigration and Nationality Directorate (IND) is, at present, holding some 300 foreign passports for which there is no current address for the owners. Arrangements are being made to return the documents to the appropriate embassy or High Commission in the United Kingdom.

Disabled Prisoners

Ms Ward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the impact of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 on facilities for disabled prisoners. [120612]

Mr. Boateng: The Prison Service has developed policies that reflect the requirements of Part III of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 (Goods, Facilities and Services) at each of its implementation stages.

A working group has been established by the Prison Service to assess the impact of the next stage of the Act, due in 2004, and to develop policies that will enable it to meet those requirements.

Prisons (Mother and Baby Units)

Sir Peter Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many mothers with young babies sentenced or remanded to prison were admitted to mother and baby units in the most recent 12 month period for which figures are available. [120622]

Mr. Boateng: There are 64 places in total available in the four prison mother and baby units. On 17 April 2000, there were 51 mothers and their babies in the units.

The information requested is given in the table.

Number of mothers admitted to prison mother and baby units for the period 5 April 1999 to 4 April 2000

	Remands	Convicted awaiting sentence	Sentenced	Total
Askham Grange	0	0	10	10
Holloway	3	2	34	39
New Hall	5	0	20	25
Styal	4	0	20	24
Total	12	2	84	98

Sir Peter Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what efforts are made to inform women received into prisons that they may apply for a place in a mother and baby unit if they already have a baby. [120621]

Mr. Boateng: The Prison Service Order on "The Management of Mother and Baby Units and the Application Process", which was published in February, requires all women's prisons to appoint a named liaison officer to be responsible for ensuring that all women, sentenced or unsentenced, who are pregnant or have a child under eighteen months are identified and informed of the arrangements for applying for a place on a mother and baby unit. All women's prisons now have a named liaison officer.

A new prisoner information booklet "All About Mother and Baby Units" was published and widely distributed to all women's prisons in March. Any eligible woman prisoner who expresses an interest in applying for a place for her child must be provided with the booklet which contains the standard application form.

Internet Voting

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to introduce voting via the Internet in (a) local, (b) national and (c) European elections; and if he will make a statement. [120368]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Representation of the People Act 2000 allows local authorities to make applications to run pilot schemes involving innovative electoral procedures. Five local authorities will be piloting electronic voting or counting at the local elections on 4 May 2000 though none of these schemes involves internet voting.

Women Prisoners (Maternity Pay)

Sir Peter Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if women prisoners who have been employed inside prisons and give birth are paid maternity pay. [120620]

Mr. Boateng: Women prisoners who have been employed within prisons and give birth are paid an allowance under regulations set out in the Prisoner Pay Manual 1992 and Standing Order 6 regulations 1993. Under these regulations, scope exists for establishments to set their own rates of pay in addition to the prescribed minima. Women prisoners are entitled to child benefit if their babies remain with them. Consideration is currently being given to introducing specific maternity pay where a woman prisoner is unable to work as a consequence of pregnancy, childbirth or caring for a child.

CABINET OFFICE

Online Services

Mr. Robert Jackson: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will list the services which (a) her Department and (b) the executive agencies responsible to her Department (i) provide online and (ii) expect to be deliverable online by 2002. [119446]

Mr. Ian McCartney: So that the Cabinet Office can publish the spring 2000 report monitoring progress towards delivery of all Government services electronically by 2005 we are currently collecting data which will include our progress on delivering 25 per cent. of Government services electronically by 2002. I do not want to pre-empt that report; however, I have included examples of the electronic services we provide, or are planning to provide, in the table.

Name	Services currently provided online	Services expected to be deliverable by 2002
Cabinet Office, including: (www.cabinet-office.gov.uk)
Central Secretariat	None at present	The Civil Service Guidance Directory will be put on the internet which will have an Access search database for people to find their way around the document.
Civil Service Pensions		Roll-out of full computerised pension administration system PenServer (August/September 2000). Electronic access for pensioners introduced (autumn 2000). Internet access for employers/scheme members to access personal data planned through PenWeb (December 2002). New Civil Service pension arrangements will be web-enabled, with communications strategy designed in that context (January 2002).
Fast Stream, European and Recruitment Division	Civil Service Recruitment website gateway. Vacancy gateway established with departments December 1999. Site currently under reconstruction. Finance being sought for further development similar to that of the award-winning Army site by December 2000.	Fast stream recruitment (May 2001). New contracts are currently being tendered. The new arrangements will involve a mix of in-house and external service delivery, all linked via a single communications portal and IT/IS support facilities. The new arrangements will provide the option for electronic application handling; and will replace paper-based testing at sift stage (12,000 candidates) with computer-based testing.
Government Information and Communication Service (www.gics.gov.uk)	Website already established (July 1999) to replace paper versions of recruitment material and provide additional information about the workings of GICS to potential new recruits.	Work now under way to establish a system which will enable candidates to receive application forms and complete them electronically for postal return of signed hard copy, by mid 2001. The intention is to establish a system where all stages of the recruitment process can be completed electronically—the timing of our ability to receive completed application forms electronically will depend on progress towards a widely accepted form of electronic signature.
Her Majesty's Stationery Office (www.hmso.gov.uk)	In June 1999 an electronic order form was introduced to enable MEPs to order official publications via HMSO over the internet. Inforoute gateway at prototype stage. Most Departments in early stages of developing their Information Asset Registers. Work is under way to ensure seamless access via the web, streamlined procedures for creating records, and close co-ordination with other information management initiatives. Submitting application to reproduce Crown and Parliamentary copyright protected material Database of full-text copies of UK legislation	Future plans are for Standard Licence Terms for reproduction of extracts from Crown and Parliamentary copyright protected material—apply and receive electronically.
Information Division	1. Press Notices—Issue of Press Notices (in association with COI) to journalists. Version 4.0 in place which allows us to e-mail press notices to COI-NDS who process file and fax to a specified list (which we maintain). Possible for press notice to be on 999 recipients fax machines approximately two minutes after the transfer of the file to COI is complete.	Version 5.0 of the software will allow the same process to be carried out but the delivery will also be available by e-mail.
	2. Cabinet Office Research and Briefing System—The system is in a prototype form at present. A project plan has been written and is being implemented. A staged roll-out will take place, which when completed will allow all divisions in the Cabinet Office to access and input information.	Initial 1st phase roll-out by the end of March—full roll-out to be agreed, but probably no later than the end of May.
Modernising Public Services (www.servicefirst.gov.uk)	Spreading Best Practice database—Online database established in July 1999, and copies of most Cabinet Office best practice publications are contained in a virtual library.	The best practice website will be extended to provide a gateway to best practice material across the public sector by 2003. CharterMark Assessment—Considering the possibility of allowing Charter Mark applicants to apply for the Award online. No firm plans yet.
Procurement Unit (www.cabinet-office.gov.uk/purchasing/index.htm)	None at present	The Unit will be expanding its electronic communications with suppliers, but cannot predict the extent to which that will have been achieved by 2002. The Unit is dependent on developments being undertaken by others, particularly the Office of Government Commerce.
Public Appointments Unit (www.Public-appointments-directory.gov.uk)	The placing on the GSI of the Public Appointments Unit 'Central List'. This is a database which contains details of approximately 5,500 people seeking a public appointment. Work is continuing with COI on a tendering exercise for the 'Central List' to be placed on the GSI. It is anticipated that the 'Central List' will be available via the GSI by the end of 2000.	The Unit is also planning to put their PAU Application form on.

The QUANGO website (www.Quango.gov.uk)	The 'Quango' website on the Cabinet Office internet site is being developed and enhanced. It is planned that the website will have links to all advertisements for public appointments; an electronic application form for the 'Central List'; and news of public appointments for candidates. Work is under way to establish links to OGDs websites. COI has been commissioned to produce the new application form, which will be put on the 'Quango' website.	The Unit is dependent on OGDs websites. However, it is anticipated that most departments will have a Public Appointment website that we will be able to link with by the end of 2001.
Regulatory Impact Unit (www.cabinet-office.gov.uk/regulation/index.htm)	In order to improve the quality of regulation enforcement, the Cabinet Office (Regulatory Impact Unit) commissioned external consultants to set up a web called INFOSHOP. The INFOSHOP System is designed to answer queries on food safety, health and safety, building control and planning regulation.	Pilot January 2000 to April 2000. Pilot report May 2000–02–28. 2000, server based system rolled out to local authorities. 2000, web-based version rolled out; likely to be by Small Business Service.
Social Exclusion Unit (www.cabinet-office.gov.uk/seu/index.htm)	The Social Exclusion National Strategy for Neighbourhood Renewal consultation report published recently invites members of the public to send their responses through via the internet link to an e-mail address within the Unit. The Unit will provide this online service for all future consultation exercises.	The Unit is also proposing a complete re-design of its existing website. This re-design will seek to incorporate Chat Forums, a Newsgroup Bulletin Board and as many up to date facilities as possible to enable individuals and organisations to obtain and exchange information with the Unit.
Agencies
Government Car and Dispatch Agency	GCDA does not currently have an internet site. They are targeted to have their own presence by April 2001.	GCDA expect to be trading online with customers by April 2002.
Central Office of Information (www.coi.gov.uk/coi	COI does not provide services to the public. As part of its service to other Government Departments, COI issues Government press releases through its dedicated News Distribution Press Release website, which can also be accessed via a link from COI's general website.	There are no plans to introduce further online services through the COI websites.

HEALTH

Health Facilities (Shropshire)

Mr. Peter Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list by constituency the (a) GP surgeries, (b) dental practices, (c) pharmacies and (d) cottage hospitals serving rural communities in Shropshire which (i) closed and (ii) opened (1) between 1979 to 1997 and (2) since May 1997. [118550]

Yvette Cooper: The information requested is not available by constituency for general practitioner surgeries, cottage hospitals and pharmacies—the figures for Shropshire as a whole are available. Information for dental practices is listed by constituency but is only available for the earlier period between January 1988 and April 1997.

GP Surgeries

There were no main surgery closures during this period, although a small number of branch surgeries or outlying consulting facilities did close. A new main GP surgery opened in Telford.

Dental practices may include not only those in the General Dental Service but also practices for the Emergency Dental Service and Personal Dental Service. Some closures and openings are for the same location where the practice has reopened under a different name. Also, a number of dental practices did cease to treat some or all of their patients as National Health Service patients during this period.

Broseley Hospital

Wellington Cottage Hospital

Ellesmere Cottage Hospital

Free School Milk

Mr. Breed: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what recent representations he has received regarding the reintroduction of free milk for school children; [119008]

(2) what recent discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for Education and Employment regarding the reintroduction of free milk for school children; and if he will make a statement. [119010]

Yvette Cooper: Policy on school milk is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment and representations on this matter are passed to him for consideration. One representation has been received as part of the consultation on the scientific review of the welfare food scheme. It is being considered along with all the other responses received.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health has not had any recent discussions with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment regarding the reintroduction of free milk for school children.

Taxol and Taxitere

Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if Taxol and Taxitere are available free of charge to NHS cancer patients in the South Staffordshire Health Authority area. [119179]

Yvette Cooper: Taxanes, a group of cancer drugs including Taxol and Taxitere, are funded on the National Health Service in the South Staffordshire Health Authority area. Each case is assessed on an individual basis as to the potential benefits of using this particular group of drugs.

Nationally, the efficiency and effectiveness of taxanes is currently being assessed by the National Institute of Clinical Excellence. The process is still continuing, but we expect the guidance to be issued shortly.

Cancer Services

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what guidelines he has issued to (a) GPs and (b) health authorities regarding the diagnosis guidelines issued in the paper entitled, "Beating Bowel Cancer"; and if he will make a statement; [118959]

(2) what assessment his Department has made of the diagnosis guidelines issued by the paper entitled "Beating Bowel Cancer"; and if he will make a statement. [118960]

Yvette Cooper: "Beating Bowel Cancer" aims to raise awareness of the symptoms of colorectal cancer. The Department published cancer referral guidelines, including those for suspected colorectal cancer, on the NHSWeb and the internet on 31 March. We are also sending copies to all general practitioners in England as well as to health authorities, National Health Service trusts and primary care groups. These guidelines will help GPs to identify more easily those patients with suspected cancer so that they can be referred promptly and appropriately for specialist investigation.

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much the NHS spent on supportive care treatments for cancer for each of the last five years; broken down by tumour type. [118963]

Yvette Cooper: Supportive treatments for cancer sufferers are important for maintaining quality of life for cancer patients by alleviating pain, countering the side effects of other treatments and for secondary prevention.

Information on spend on cancer treatment in supportive care is not currently available.

The Department has commissioned work to improve overall National Health Service information, including national statistics on hospital prescribing, which will give us a more accurate method of recording hospital expenditure in cancer treatment.

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received regarding the Medical Research Council's proposed CR08 trial into the treatment of colorectal cancer; and if he will make a statement. [118958]

Yvette Cooper: The Medical Research Council are still finalising the details of this trial to assess the role of two new agents in the management of advanced colorectal cancer.

The arrangements for National Health Service support for the trial will be handled through the existing mechanisms laid out in the "Concordat Between the Health Departments and the Medical Research Council, 1997", and "Health Service Guidelines, HSG(97)32", copies of which are available in the Library.

Osteoporosis

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what funds have been allocated and to which projects for research and development on osteoporosis; and if he will make a statement. [119152]

Yvette Cooper: Our funding for research is provided through a number of routes.

The Medical Research Council (MRC) is the main agency through which we support research on the causes and treatment of disease. The MRC receives most of its income via grant-in-aid from the office of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. The Department funds research to support policy development in health and social care, and to support effective practice in the National Health Service. The Department also provides NHS support funding for research commissioned by the MRC and charities that takes place in the NHS.

The MRC spent £2.7 million in 1999–2000 on research of direct relevance to osteoporosis. It has a wide portfolio of work ranging from a number of epidemiological studies at the MRC Environmental Epidemiology Unit to more basic work on bone density being carried out at a number of other institutions.

The Department is funding the following projects: "A Systematic literature review of technologies for the diagnosis and monitoring of osteoporosis"—Cost: £55,770, and "Treatment of established osteoporosis"—Cost: £77,704.

In addition, the Department of Health provides support for research commissioned by charities and the Medical Research Council that take place in the NHS. Project details of work directly funded by the Department or supported through NHS research and development funding can be found on the National Research Register (NRR). This is available in the Library and most medical libraries on CD Rom, and on the internet: http://www.doh.gov.uk/nrr.htm. The NRR contains many details of projects/trials relating to osteoporosis.

Priorities for departmental research and development support for the development of policy are determined through discussion with policy colleagues, the Departmental Research Committee and Ministers. In the NHS research and development programme, priorities take account of widespread consultation with those using, delivering and managing services, within a framework overseen by the Central Research and Development Committee for the NHS. In all cases, priorities for our budgets reflect analysis of the burden of disease, potential benefits, our priorities, and take account of the responsibilities and work of other funders.

Teenage Pregnancy

Ms McCafferty: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to reduce the number of unplanned teenage pregnancies; and if he will make a statement. [119186]

Yvette Cooper: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 14 June 1999, Official Report, column 17W.

The Social Exclusion Unit's report on teenage pregnancy, published on 14 June 1999, sets out a thirty point action plan working across Government. It highlights two main goals:

Reducing the number of teenage conceptions, with the specific aim of halving the rate of conceptions among under-18s by 2010; and

Getting more teenage parents into education, training or employment to reduce their risk of long term social exclusion.

Copies of the report are available in the Library.

BCG Vaccine

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the size of his Department's stock of BCG vaccine. [119107]

Yvette Cooper: As at the end of March 2000, stocks of BCG vaccine in its various presentations available to the National Health Service were as follows:

Intradermal 10 dose (without diluent)—zero

Intradermal 10 dose (with diluent)—17,729 packs × 5 vials

Intradermal 50 dose—1,079 packs × 5 vials

Percutaneous—zero.

The percutaneous presentation of the vaccine is used when administering vaccine by an alternative (multiple puncture) method applicable only in babies and young infants. In the absence of this presentation of the vaccine, the intradermal 10 dose (with diluent) presentation has been diverted for use in this important group.

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the future of BCG vaccination programmes in schools. [119106]

Yvette Cooper: We are advised on all matters concerning immunisation by the independent expert committee, the Joint Committee on Vaccination and Immunisation. The committee keeps all immunisation policies under review. Recommendations on the use of BCG vaccine were last reviewed by the committee during 1996 and they advised that the schools immunisation programme should continue. This recommendation remains unchanged although, due to problems with supply of BCG vaccine, the schools part of the BCG programme is currently in suspension.

Tuberculosis

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the number of reported cases of TB in (a) 1970, (b) 1980, (c) 1990 and (d) each of the last five years for which figures are available. [119105]

Yvette Cooper: The information requested is given in the table:

Number of reported cases of tuberculosis, England and Wales

Year	Number
1970	11,901
1980	9,142
1990	5,402
1995	5,606
1996	5,654
1997	5,859
1998	6,087
1999	6,144

Source:
Public Health Laboratory Service data

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the average cost to the NHS of treating a patient with TB in the last financial year for which figures are available. [119155]

Yvette Cooper: The average cost to the National Health Service of treating a patient with tuberculosis is not available. However, information on the national average cost for the inpatient treatment of an individual patient with tuberculosis for the 1998–99 financial year is available from the National Schedule of Reference Costs and is as follows:

	Elective inpatient	Non elective inpatient	Day case
Pulmonary or pleural tuberculosis	1,770	1,676	295
Other tuberculosis	1,400	1,800	293

Note:

Costs are the national average for inpatient treatment for patients with tuberculosis calculated from the individual NHS trust figures provided on an annual basis.

The length of inpatient stay for patients with tuberculosis varies. It should be noted that treatment for tuberculosis can last for six months or more and for most of this time the patient will not be hospitalised.

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which health authorities have abandoned the school immunisation programme for TB. [119108]

Yvette Cooper: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) on 11 January 2000, Official Report, column 144W.

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which health authorities have reported cases of TB in each of the last five years. [119103]

Yvette Cooper: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for the Vale of Clwyd (Mr. Ruane) on 28 February 2000, Official Report, columns 70–71W.

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people died from TB in the (a) 1970s, (b) 1980s and (c) 1990s. [119109]

Yvette Cooper: Information provided by the Office for National Statistics shows that, between 1970 and 1979, there were 8,781 reported deaths from tuberculosis in England and Wales; between 1980 and 1989 there were 5,028 reported deaths from tuberculosis; and, between 1990 and 1998 (the latest available date for which data are available) there were 3,621 reported deaths from tuberculosis.

Notes:

Data are for England and Wales.

Tuberculosis is defined by ICD(8) and (9) 010–018.

Data from 1970 to 1992 are by date of registration; those from 1993 to 1998 are by date of occurrence.

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to review the programme of immunisation against TB among school age children. [119104]

Yvette Cooper: We are advised on all matters concerning immunisation by the independent expert committee, the Joint Committee on Vaccination and Immunisation. The committee keeps all immunisation policies under review.

Mr. Breed: To ask the Secretary of State for Health for what reason there was a shortage of tuberculosis vaccinations between October 1999 and April 2000; and what steps his Department has taken to improve the supply of vaccinations. [120401]

Yvette Cooper: I refer the hon. Member to the replies given to the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles) on 11 January 2000, Official Report, columns 143–44W and on 13 April 2000, Official Report, column 282W.

Mr. Breed: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent discussions have taken place between Ministers in his Department and the NHS Purchasing and Supply Agency regarding the restoration of tuberculosis testing within secondary schools. [120370]

Yvette Cooper: The National Health Service Purchasing and Supply Agency (formally NHS Supplies) provides a procurement service for the Department and does not make recommendations on the use of the vaccines.

The programme to test for tuberculosis and to immunise with BCG vaccine continues for people in higher risk groups, whatever their age. Only the routine BCG immunisation programme in schools is in suspension at present.

Fibreglass Insulation

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what evidence his Department has assessed concerning the dangers to health from fibreglass used for insulation purposes; and if he will make a statement. [118950]

Yvette Cooper: The Committee on Carcinogenicity of Chemicals in Food, Consumer Products and the Environment have considered the carcinogenicity of those man made mineral fibres (glass, rock and slag wool) used for insulation purposes on a number of occasions since 1984. Their advice is that domestic exposures arising from infrequent or short-term do-it-yourself installation do not pose a carcinogenic risk. It was their view that these materials do not meet the European Union's criteria for classification of compounds as carcinogens. However there was limited evidence that occupational exposure was associated with lung cancer, although no definite conclusions could be drawn because there was a lack of information about confounding factors, such as tobacco smoking. It would be prudent, however, to act on the basis that sufficient occupational exposure may increase the risk of lung cancer.

National Vaccination Programme

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how clinicians, general practitioners and primary care staff are kept updated on vaccine availability; and what plans he has to improve the arrangements. [119258]

Yvette Cooper: Vaccine Update is a monthly newsletter produced by the National Health Service Purchasing and Supply Agency (formally NHS Supplies). It is the primary source of advice for health professionals on vaccine availability. About 7,000 copies are centrally distributed each month and further copying occurs locally.

There is a contact name and telephone number on this newsletter for inquiries. The central distributor, Farillon, also answers inquiries.

Plans are in hand to alter the format of this newsletter to allow it to be available via the Internet. Any urgent communications can also be made to health professionals via the Public Health Link system, Chief Medical Officer (CMO) letters and the CMO Update.

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received concerning the distribution arrangements for the national vaccination programme and the performance of Farillon. [119257]

Yvette Cooper: The contract to provide centralised storage and distribution of vaccine to support the childhood immunisation campaign is currently held by Farillon Ltd.

The NHS Purchasing and Supply Agency (formally NHS Supplies) monitors all aspects of this contract as an agency of the Department.

Any representations from those involved in the vaccine programme are directed to Farillon and brought to the attention of NHS PSA. A monthly meeting is held between the Department, the National Health Service Purchasing and Supply Agency and Farillon to review performance. Any concerns are dealt with at such times.

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has for improving the distribution system for the national vaccination programme. [119259]

Yvette Cooper: Farillon Ltd. currently provides the storage and distribution of vaccine to support the childhood immunisation programme.

A recent example of a new initiative in distribution has been the allocation model used to supply the new Meningococcal C conjugate vaccine. This has enabled over 10 million doses to date of this vaccine to be distributed equitably across the country in line with the roll-out of the campaign. No other country in the world currently has the facility to provide such a service with direct delivery to general practitioners on a weekly basis through a guaranteed cold chain computerised service. GPs are now able to review their future supplies through Internet access. The distribution arrangements are kept under continual review.

Live Animal Experiments

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 5 April 2000, Official Report, column 509W, on live animal experiments, if he will introduce a legal requirement that labels on medicines for use on humans and animals include a statement that the medicine has been tested on animals. [119231]

Yvette Cooper: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave on 5 April 2000, Official Report, column 509W, in which I explained that the labelling of medicinal products is governed by European law. Therefore the United Kingdom cannot unilaterally introduce additional national statutory requirements in this area and the Government have no plans to propose such an amendment to European law.

Health Authority Reorganisation

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of health authority reorganisation proposals objected to by community health councils and referred to him since 1 May 1997 he has (a) approved and (b) rejected. [119472]

Ms Stuart: Of the 21 objections referred by community health councils to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State since 1 May 1997 14 per cent. were accepted, 57 per cent. were rejected, 14 per cent. resulted in amendments to health authorities' proposals, 5 per cent. were withdrawn following a change in circumstances and 10 per cent. are still awaiting a decision.

HIV

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the identifiable causes of human immunodeficiency virus. [119703]

Yvette Cooper: There is international scientific consensus that the Human Immunodeficiency Virus (HIV) causes the Acquired Immunodeficiency Syndrome (AIDS). HIV infection is a communicable condition which is transmitted by a number of routes but predominantly by unprotected sexual intercourse. It is not possible to identify the origins of the human immunodeficiency virus itself. There are a number of possible hypotheses concerning its origin which are the subject of current scientific debate.

Flu Vaccine

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how may hospital beds were occupied by influenza victims in November and December 1999 and January and February 2000 by patients who had not been vaccinated against flu. [119667]

Yvette Cooper: Figures for hospital activity during the winter period will not be available until the autumn this year, but information on whether or not these patients have been immunised against influenza is not collected.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to ensure that (a) at-risk groups, (b) essential service workers and (c) all those over 65 have flu vaccine available for next winter. [119669]

Yvette Cooper: The Department is committed to improving influenza vaccine uptake in the recommended risk groups this year and an implementation group is currently considering the steps needed to deliver these improvements.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to reduce the age at which flu vaccine is made available. [120097]

Yvette Cooper: The Department is committed to improving influenza vaccine uptake this year. Ministers are currently considering the Joint Committee on Vaccination and Immunisation's advice on the age above which flu vaccine is recommended as national policy.

NHS Dentistry

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to publish his strategy on NHS dentistry. [119753]

Mr. Hutton: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice) on 2 May 2000, Official Report, column 46W.

Dispensing Doctors

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what choice is open to patients to have prescriptions dispensed by a dispensing doctor; [119725]

(2) if he will amend the terms of the NHS (Pharmaceutical Services) Regulations 1992 to enable patients living within one mile of a pharmacy to have the choice of having prescriptions dispensed by a dispensing doctor; and if he will make a statement. [119726]

Ms Stuart: Patients may have their prescriptions dispensed by their general practitioner if they live in controlled localities (that is to say, rural areas), more than one mile from the nearest pharmacy and the practitioners have been granted permission by their health authority to dispense prescriptions. Other patients may also apply to the health authority for their doctor to dispense their prescriptions if the patients experience serious difficulty in obtaining their medicines from a pharmacy due to the distance involved or lack of transport. We have no plans to permit doctors to dispense to other patients.

Prostate Cancer

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what legal advice he has taken on the failure of some health trusts to ensure referral within three weeks for patients with possible prostate cancer. [119735]

Yvette Cooper: The White Paper "The new NHS—Modern, Dependable" set the standard that everyone with suspected cancer will be able to see a specialist within two weeks of their GP deciding that they need to be seen urgently and requesting an appointment. These arrangements were introduced for women with suspected breast cancer from April 1999 and are being put in place for all other cases of suspected cancer during 2000. The standard will be introduced for prostate cancer in December. We have published referral guidelines to assist GPs in determining those patients who need to be referred urgently within two weeks to see a specialist. The referral guidelines are not mandatory but represent guidance on best available evidence. Clinical judgment will, in addition to the guidelines, play an important part in reaching any clinical decision.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to increase funding for research into prostate cancer. [119729]

Yvette Cooper: The latest figure available for annual Government expenditure (Department of Health/National Health Service, Medical Research Council and other Government Departments—principally devolved health departments) on prostate cancer is £1.55 million. This figure underestimates the total Government research and development expenditure in this area, as detailed estimates of NHS support funding are not collected routinely.

Since 1997 we have committed over £800,000 to new research projects on prostate cancer, through the Medical Research Council and through the Department. The Department has actively sought to support such work in prostate cancer, and has not rejected any high quality proposals for work in this area.

The Department recently announced £1 million additional new funding for urgent research studies into prostate cancer as a mark of its concern over this disease.

Following the seminar last year at No. 10 a "Cancer Research Funders' Forum" has been established to help improve the co-ordination of cancer research in the UK. It is being run by the MRC and includes DH representatives and the major cancer research charities. At the Department's request, the Forum considered the issue of prostate cancer at its first meeting on 10 January. They agreed to set up an expert group on prostate cancer, which will identify gaps in current research and suggest ways of filling them. The expert group met for the first time on 25 February, and expects to report within months.

We have recently appointed a National Cancer Director, Professor Mike Richards, who will spearhead our concerted drive on cancer. He will work in partnership with doctors, nurses, general practitioners, other health professionals and the voluntary sector to improve prevention and modernise cancer services to help ensure equitable access to high quality cancer care. This will include a close interest in the development and progression of research.

MMR Vaccine

Mr. Coleman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if his Department will release the underlying data used to compile the study his Department commissioned for publication in The Lancet into the effects of the MMR vaccine. [120029]

Yvette Cooper: The epidemiological study published in The Lancet in June 1999 was an independent study commissioned by the Medicines Control Agency. This study was designed to investigate a possible association between measles, mumps and rubella vaccination and autism and found no evidence for a causal association. A copy has been placed in the Library. The study was accepted for publication in The Lancet following a process of rigorous independent peer review in the normal manner. It is not usual for peer-reviewed data to be subject to reanalysis by third parties. The Department therefore does not propose to ask the independent investigators to release their data.

Dystonia

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much money has been spent on researching dystonia in each of the last five years. [119834]

Yvette Cooper: The main Government agency for research into the causes of, and treatment for, disease is the Medical Research Council (MRC) funded via grant-in-aid from the Office of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

The MRC has spent the following amounts on research related to dystonia:

Year	£
1994–95	1,435,000
1995–96	1,702,000
1996–97	1,784,000
1997–98	1,731,000
1998–99	1,769,000

In addition, the MRC funds related research into related movement disorders such as Parkinson's, Huntington's and Multiple Sclerosis.

The Department of Health provides support funding for research commissioned by Research Councils and charities which is undertaken in the National Health Service. It is not possible to calculate how much of this support funding is spent on projects related to Dystonia. The Department also funds research to support policy development in health and social care, and to support effective practice in the NHS.

Project details of work supported by the Department can be found on the National Research Register which is available in the Library and on the internet: www.doh.gov.uk/nrr

Mental Health

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much money there was in the Mental Health Research and Development budget in each region (a) at the end of the financial year 1999–2000 and (b) at the beginning of financial year 2000–01. [120034]

Mr. Hutton: Government funding for research is provided through a number of routes.

The Medical Research Council (MRC) is the main agency through which the Government supports research on the causes and treatment of disease. The MRC receives most of its income via grant-in-aid from the office of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. The Department funds research to support policy development in health and social care, and to support effective practice in the National Health Service. The Department also provides NHS support funding for research commissioned by the MRC and charities that takes place in the NHS.

Research is commissioned from the organisations best able to undertake high quality work. Funding is not allocated on a regional basis.

The MRC spent approximately £63 million in 1999–2000 and estimates that it will spend £66 million in 2000–01 on neuroscience and mental health research.

The Department invests approximately £40 million per year on research directly relevant to mental health, £7 million on directly commissioned projects, and £33 million to support work on mental health funded by research councils and charities which is undertaken in the NHS. Management of the research supported by NHS research and development funding in trusts is devolved and details of expenditure at the project level are not currently collected routinely by the Department. It is not therefore possible to give accurate details of expenditure year by year.

Project details of work directly funded by the Department or supported through NHS research and development funding can be found on the National Research Register (NRR). This is available in the Library and most medical libraries on CD Rom, and on the Internet: http://www.doh.gov.uk/nrr.htm. The NRR also contains many details of projects/trials funded by the MRC and other funders.

Heart Operations

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many heart operations were performed in each of the last 10 years. [119991]

Yvette Cooper: The table shows the number of finished consultant episodes where a heart operation was performed, and the number of finished consultant episodes where a coronary artery bypass graft was performed, in National Health Service hospitals in England for the years 1989–90 to 1998–99.

OPCS4R codes used/Procedure	1989–90	1990–91	1991–92	1992–93	1993–94	1994–95	1995–96	1996–97	1997–98	1998–99
K40–46/CABGs	12,483	14,070	16,046	18,352	20,394	23,533	22,922	22,694	22,181	23,663
K01–70/All heart ops	[1]—	83,065	106,374	120,394	130,502	148,797	153,736	162,146	161,890	177,650

[1] Data for 1989–90 for all heart operations is currently unavailable.

Notes:

1. Data in this table is grossed for both coverage and unknown/invalid clinical data, except for 1997–98 and 1998–99 which are ungrossed.
2. An FCE is defined as a period of patient care under one consultant in one health care provider. The figures do not represent the number of patients, as one person may have several episodes within the year.
3. These figures represent a count of all FCEs where the procedure was mentioned in any of the four operation fields in the HES data set

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Coleman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what amounts each London borough claimed in excess of the maximum grant available from his Department for (a) single asylum seekers and (b) asylum families with children for (i) 1997–98 and (ii) 1998–99; and if he will make a statement. [120028]

Mr. Hutton: The table shows the maximum amounts that local authorities were eligible to claim per week for single adults and families with children in 1997–98 and 1998–99.

Local authorities could not claim in excess of these sums. Although a local authority's total relevant expenditure may have exceeded the maximum grant payable, any excess expenditure incurred above that sum would have to be met locally and not by central government.

The maximum amount payable in respect of each grant was as follows:

	Amount payable 1997–98
Adults	£140 per week
Families	80 per cent. of relevant expenditure above relevant local authority threshold
1998–99
Adults	£165 per week
Families	£230 per family per week, or £240 in the case of any family of asylum seekers provided with services in Inner London prior to 23 November 1998

Squalene

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what adverse reactions there have been as a result of the use of squalene in vaccines. [120200]

Yvette Cooper: None. There are no licensed vaccines in the UK which include squalene as an adjuvant.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if squalene is authorised for use in vaccines in the UK. [120105]

Yvette Cooper: Squalene is not authorised for use in vaccines in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what monitoring his Department is undertaking of patients who have been given squalene vaccine. [120301]

Yvette Cooper: Squalene is not itself a vaccine, but has been licensed in Italy as an adjuvant to influenza vaccine. Monitoring of all vaccines given in the United Kingdom is performed by the Medicines Control Agency and the Committee on Safety of Medicines.

Mr. Hancock. To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent research he has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated on the use of squalene as an adjuvant in vaccines. [120104]

Yvette Cooper: No research has been commissioned on the use of squalene as an adjuvant in vaccines.

As for any new medicinal product, evaluation of research on the use of squalene as an adjuvant in vaccines, presented as part of a marketing application, would be performed by the Medicines Control Agency under conditions of commercial confidentiality.

European Food Authority

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the planned European Food Authority will replace the UK Food Standards Agency. [120188]

Ms Stuart: No it will not replace the United Kingdom Food Standards Agency. The White Paper clearly states that the proposed European Food Authority must be a "value-added structure" which will work in close co-operation with national agencies and institutions, thus making the best use of existing structures and resources.

We envisage that the planned European Food Authority will work in close co-operation with our own agency which, in any case, has a wider remit than the proposed Authority.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the estimated first full year cost of running (a) the UK Food Standards Agency and (b) the European Food Authority. [120189]

Ms Stuart: The gross budget for the Food Standards Agency in its first full year (2000–01) is £148 million including £8 million for the executives in the devolved administrations, and £70 million for its executive agency, the Meat Hygiene Service. (The £148 million is net of internal transfers between the Food Standards Agency headquarters and the Meat Hygiene Service).

The Commission has proposed that the European Food Authority has a budget of only 100 million ecus (£62.5 million). We will have to be clear about whether this is an additional cost or total funding. Clearly most of the functions of the EFA are already performed elsewhere within the EU framework and we must be careful to avoid duplication of effort.

Food Safety White Paper

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which of the proposed measures in the EU White Paper on food safety in the EU will be opposed by Her Majesty's Government. [120209]

Ms Stuart: The Government believe that consumer concerns and the complexity of current arrangements demand urgent action to develop a coherent European Union policy for the foodstuffs sector based firmly on the fundamental importance of consumer protection. We welcome the White Paper and share the objective it outlines.

We look forward to more detailed proposals on which discussion can take place once individual measures are brought forward.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what amendment of the law he plans to comply with the programme outlined in the EU White Paper on food safety. [120187]

Ms Stuart: The proposed legislative programme contains many individual initiatives which the Government have been pressing for and some have been expected for some time. In a number of cases the legislation proposed is amending existing legislation. We await individual, more detailed, proposals to be brought forward by the European Commission.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the additional costs to (a) the British food industry and (b) farmers of the proposals set out in the EU's White Paper on food safety. [120208]

Ms Stuart: None. The Commission has consulted widely on the White Paper and the Food Standards Agency has discussed various issues with key organisations, including those representing farmers and the food industry. They have been encouraged to respond direct to the Commission.

Once individual proposals have been produced all interested stakeholders will be consulted. The United Kingdom will be pressing for proportionality, bearing in mind the need to safeguard the interests of the consumer.

Data Storage

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice his Department gives to hospitals and others to (a) back up their data frequently and regularly and (b) install circuit breakers. [120699]

Yvette Cooper: National Health Service organisations have already received best practice guidance on a wide range of information security matters including data back-up and power supplies and these are contained within the NHS Information Authority publication "Ensuring Security and Confidentiality in NHS Organisations". Copies of this guidance will be placed in the Library.

AIDS Care Education Funding

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to reach a decision on section 64 funding for AIDS care education training. [120372]

Yvette Cooper: I will be making an announcement shortly.

Fostered Children

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the cost of providing foster homes and their equivalent in (a) 1970, (b) 1980 and (c) 1999. [120664]

Mr. Hutton: Information on the unit cost of providing foster homes and their equivalent is not available for 1970 and 1980. Provisional data taken from "Social Services Performance in 1998–99—The Personal Social Services Performance Assessment Framework" indicate that the unit cost of foster care for 1998–99 was £199 per child per week.

Toxicology Teaching

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the teaching of toxicology to medical students. [120499]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 2 May 2000]: Individual university medical schools determine their own undergraduate medical curricula in the light of the recommendations from the General Medical Council's (GMC) Education Committee, which has the statutory responsibility to determine the extent of knowledge and skill required for the granting of primary medical qualifications in the UK. The Committee's most recent recommendations were published in the 1993 report "Tomorrow's Doctors".

University medical schools are in the process of implementing the recommendations contained in the report and the GMC is monitoring progress.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Sure Start

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when the Sure Start Plus scheme will start; and if he will make a statement. [120120]

Yvette Cooper: I announced the 20 Sure Start Plus pilot areas on 1 March 2000. Further guidance on Sure Start Plus will be issued in early summer inviting programmes to draw up plans for implementation in the autumn.

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when the next round of applications for Sure Start schemes will be announced. [120121]

Yvette Cooper: Sure Start is committed to establishing at least 250 local Sure Start programmes in areas of greatest need by the end of 2001–02. Of these, 121 have already been announced. A further round will be announced in the summer.

Teachers (Early Retirement)

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many teachers took early retirement in (a) 1970, (b) 1980 and (c) 1999; if he will list the most frequently cited reasons for taking early retirement; and what was the cost to public funds of granting such early retirement. [119770]

Ms Estelle Morris: Early retirement falls into two categories: ill-health and premature retirement. Full-time teachers taking early retirement from the maintained nursery, primary, secondary and special sector in England in 1980, 1990, 1997 and 1999 are as follows:

Calendar year	Ill-health	Premature	Total
1980	1,000	3,700	4,700
1990	4,000	8,100	12,100
1997	4,400	14,100	18,500
1999	2,100	2,700	4,700

Note:
Totals may not add to component parts because of rounding

Retirement data are not available for 1970; premature retirement was not introduced until 1977. The number of teachers taking ill-health and premature retirement was much higher during the 1990s than in previous years. The conditions for awarding an ill-health or premature retirement were changed during 1997 and as a result the numbers of early retirements had fallen by 1999.

Premature retirement can be awarded because of redundancy or employer efficiency gains; ill-health retirement includes reasons of injury or illness (physical and mental).

The capitalised additional cost of an ill-health retirement was recently estimated to be on average in the order of £50,000-£60,000 when compared with preserved benefits if the individual had simply resigned. The figure for premature retirements is estimated to be in the order of £30,000-£40,000.

School Leavers

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many pupils who left school in (a) 1970, (b) 1980 and (c) 1999 with no educational qualifications came from (i) intact and (ii) broken families. [120659]

Ms Estelle Morris: The numbers of pupils in England with no educational qualifications, either by the end of their final year of compulsory schooling or when they left school, are shown in the table. Data on pupils' family background are not collected.

Numbers and proportion of pupils[1] with no educational qualifications in England

	Total pupils[1] (Thousand)	Total with no qualifications (Thousand)	Proportion with no qualification (Percentage)
1970	614.2	275.9	45
1980	750.7	91.4	12
1999	581.0	35.0	6

[1] The figures for 1970 and 1980 are based on the numbers of school leavers of any age and the numbers of those leavers that had no qualifications. The figures for 1999 are based on pupils in their final year of compulsory schooling, whether they left school or not.

New Deal

Mr. Allan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what (i) amount and (ii) percentage of the proceeds of the windfall tax allocated in the 1999 Budget to (a) the New Deal for 18 to 24-year-olds, (b) the New Deal for the long-term unemployed, (c) the New Deal for lone parents and (d) the New Deal for the sick and disabled, for expenditure during the 1999–2000 financial year were (1) spent during that year and (2) carried forward for future years, indicating the reasons for any underspend. [120411]

Mr. Blunkett: The information requested will not be available until June when outturn expenditure is confirmed and agreement reached with the Treasury on amounts to be carried forward. Table 4.1 of the Financial Statement and Budget Report March 2000 sets out the latest published allocations for 1999–2000.

Racial Discrimination

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment on how many occasions in the past 10 years the Secretary of State for Education and Employment has used his powers to give directions under sections (a) 496 and (b) 497 of the Education Act 1996 (i) in relation to individual complaints of racial discrimination in education referred under section 57(5) of the Race Relations Act 1976, (ii) following findings of unlawful discrimination in a formal investigation by the Commission for Racial Equality and (iii) to enforce the general duty under section 19(1) of the Race Relations Act 1976. [120640]

Jacqui Smith: In 1999–2000, 33 complaints of racial discrimination in education were received by the Department. None of these were referred to the Secretary of State. Information for previous years is not held centrally and could not be obtained except at disproportionate cost.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Car Worker Retraining Programmes

Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement regarding retraining programmes available to car workers made redundant at Longbridge and its suppliers. [119632]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The Rover Task Force produced an interim report that was presented on 26 April to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, who welcomed the proposals.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has pledged £129 million to assist the people and businesses of the west midlands and the report made a number of recommendations about short and medium-term actions that should be taken to regenerate the region. These include a number of initiatives that will tackle employee re-skilling and re-training for workers from Rover and its supplier chain who will be made redundant or whose jobs will be affected. Funding of more than £27 million has been approved to support this work, to help individuals and to aid supplier chain diversification which will include the re-training of up to 4,000 workers.

The report also recommends three new initiatives to support employees which will:

extend engineer secondments in the supply chain group through major vehicle companies; create access to an innovative on-line training system for the automotive supply sector; introduce a regional mechanism for the co-ordination of modern apprenticeships and new deal programme participants.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what changes have been made recently in the officials dealing with coal and industrial subsidy. [120207]

Mrs. Liddell: The information requested is as follows:

Mrs. Ann Taylor moved into the Energy Group on 21 February 2000 to replace Mr. Alan Wright as Director, Coal Health Claims Unit in Energy Policy, Technology, Analysis and Coal Directorate. Mr. Wright moved on the same date to a post in the Department's Finance and Resources Management Directorate.

Mr. Stephen Spivey moved into the Energy Group on 14 February 2000 to fill a temporary post in the BNFL Public Private Partnership Team. He then moved to a new post in Nuclear Industries Directorate as Director, UKAEA Quinquennial Review Team, on 10 April 2000.

Dr. Stephen Sklaroff, Director, BNFL Public Private Partnership Team resigned from the Department with effect from 15 March 2000. Mr. John Rhodes moved into the Energy Group on 20 March to replace Dr. Sklaroff.

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry who his Department's (a) Director of Energy Utilities and (b) Director of Coal Units are. [120118]

Mrs. Liddell: The following is the information:

(a) Mr. Jonathan Green

(b) Mr. Peter Mason

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if BMW has indicated that it would consider a bid for (a) the new Mini and (b) the R30. [120076]

Mr. Byers: I refer to the evidence given by Professor Samann to the Trade and Industry Select Committee on 29 March 2000.

Media Discussions

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions he, his Ministers and his officials had with (a) Kevin Maguire and (b) Keith Harper of The Guardian during (i) the week beginning 10 April, (ii) Saturday 15 April and (iii) Sunday 16 April; and what subjects were discussed. [120109]

Mr. Byers: My Department maintains regular contact with a range of journalists.

Post Offices

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many post offices were closed in each year from 1992 to 1999; and how many were opened. [120797]

Mr. Alan Johnson: I understand from the Post Office that historical data for the numbers of post offices opened are not available. The net numbers of post office closures are as follows:

1996	193
1997	163
1998	243
1999	233

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Out-of-school-hours Study

12. Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to establish a new entitlement to regular out-of-school-hours study support for older primary pupils and secondary schools. [119635]

Mr. Wills: We know that taking part in out-of-school-hours study support improves pupil attitudes and is linked to better performance at school. Virtually all schools already provide some study support activities and around half of all pupils attend at least one activity per week. We want to extend that to all pupils, which is why we have announced our intention to provide all older primary and secondary pupils with the opportunity to take part in these activities.

Evidence suggests that disadvantaged young people benefit most from the kind of study support opportunities that other young people may take for granted, such as learning to play a musical instrument or having the space or encouragement to do their homework. It is for these reasons that this Government have, for the first time, ring-fenced significant funding for study support, which we are targeting on young people from disadvantaged areas.

To date, almost 2,000 schools have benefited from a share of the £240 million that is available for study support through the New Opportunities Fund. In addition to this, around 6,800 schools are expected to benefit this year from £20 million of Standards Fund money for study support, and this amount will rise to £60 million next year.

Performance-related Pay (Teachers)

15. Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what recent representations he has received regarding performance-related pay for teachers. [119638]

Ms Estelle Morris: The Government's proposals for teachers' pay reform were initially outlined in the Green Paper, "Teachers: meeting the challenge of change"

(Cm 4164). We have discussed our proposals extensively with all teacher unions and other key stakeholders. Following publication of the draft School Teachers' Pay and Conditions Document 2000 on 2 May, we are continuing discussions with statutory consultees.

New Deal

18. Mr. John Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to extend the scope of the New Deal for the long-term unemployed. [119641]

Ms Jowell: The New Deal for those aged 25 and over has already helped over 38,000 people into jobs. This year we are investing almost £100 million in strengthening the advisory process, making it more intensive and work-focused, and in extending the existing pilots. From April 2001, this New Deal will be extended to all those who have been unemployed for 18 months or more. It will provide intensive support to find work, including high quality training and work experience, building on the successful approach of New Deal for young people.

Information and Communications Technology

19. Mr. Connarty: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to ensure that all social groups have equal opportunities for access to information and communications technology. [119643]

Mr. Wills: We are taking forward a range of measures to ensure that everyone can benefit from the advantages of new technologies. The ICT Learning Centres initiative will give many people living in disadvantaged communities in England the opportunity to access the Internet and ICT facilities. We have recently announced a pilot project to wire-up deprived communities to bring housing estates, tower blocks and rural areas on line. We are also introducing a scheme—"Computers within Reach"—to pilot arrangements for those who cannot afford new computers to acquire reconditioned computers. The recently published report of Policy Action Team 15 looked specifically at issues relating to the role of ICT in community renewal, including the availability of ICT to black and minority ethnic groups. We will continue to work with partners and the private sector to address the issue of closing the digital divide.

20. Dr. Palmer: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what support has been given to teachers to ensure that they are able to utilise information and communications technology to raise standards. [119644]

Mr. Wills: The New Opportunities Fund is making available £230 million to support the training of serving teachers and school library staff in the maintained sector in the effective use of information and communication technology (ICT). The training is available to all teachers in maintained schools and is specifically targeted at using ICT in the classroom to support the National Curriculum. In addition, in the period up to 2002, the Department will have supported local education authorities expenditure of more than £700 million on ICT hardware, software and training for their schools.

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to ensure that people in deprived communities develop ICT skills for employability. [119625]

Mr. Wills: From 15 May, we will be making available 50,000 extra training opportunities in England for people claiming benefits to acquire basic computer skills with recognised first-rung qualifications. The courses will increase their chances of getting a job as well as enable those who wish to develop their ICT skills further. In addition, the Government are making £15 million available for a pilot scheme—"Computers Within Reach"—to enable those who cannot afford new computers to acquire reconditioned computers for use in the home for the purpose of improving their employment prospects, for lifelong learning, or for their children's homework. We recently announced a £10 million project to wire up disadvantaged communities, enabling people living in them to use the new information and communications technologies to access jobs, learning opportunities, Government and other services. We are also establishing around 700 ICT Learning Centres in the most deprived communities. These centres will offer access to those initial ICT skills that are increasingly essential to people's job and career prospects.

Complaints Procedures

21. Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he expects to proceed with regulations requiring school governing bodies to establish a complaints system. [119645]

Ms Estelle Morris: My right hon. Friend has no immediate plans to do so, especially as the majority of schools have their own complaints procedures. We have to balance the advantages of setting out national minimum requirements against the disadvantages of introducing another bureaucratic burden. School staff should respond seriously to parental concerns and complaints, to avoid the need for them to go to governing bodies. And governing bodies, in their own interests, should have effective mechanisms in place for handling any parental complaints that do reach them, so that difficulties are resolved swiftly and fairly.

Lecturers

22. Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to improve the pay and conditions of part-time lecturing staff in further and higher education. [119646]

Mr. Wicks: Pay and conditions for FE and HE staff are an important issue, although the detailed arrangements are for employers to determine. We have increased the funding for higher education by over £1 billion over the four years to 2001–02. And we have made the biggest ever investment in FE, increasing funds from £3.1 billion in 1998–99 to £3.9 billion in 2001–02. We are encouraging employers and unions to work together on sensible ways forward under the improved circumstances we have created.

Better Regulation Task Force

23. Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the implications of the recent report of the better regulation task force for the work of secondary school (a) teachers and (b) headmasters. [119647]

Ms Estelle Morris: I welcome the report from the Better Regulation Task Force Review of Red Tape Affecting Head Teachers. It is a helpful contribution to the Government's campaign to raise standards in both secondary and primary schools.

My Department is committed to do all that it can to help head teachers and classroom teachers focus on their priority task of raising standards of attainment for pupils. We have already taken steps to reduce needless bureaucracy, but we recognise there is more to be done. We will build on the work we have done and have given the £80 million in 2000–01 for small schools' administrative support.

Headteachers (Gloucestershire)

24. Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the number of headteachers leaving the profession in Gloucestershire; and if he will make a statement. [119648]

Ms Estelle Morris: The leaving rate of headteachers in Gloucestershire during 1997–98 (the latest year for which figures are available) was 9.4 per cent., similar to the national rate of 9.6 per cent. Since that time the leaving rate of headteachers taking early retirement has declined, although the full figures for headteacher leavers are not yet available.

Higher Education

25. Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps he is taking to improve teaching standards in higher education. [119649]

Mr. Wicks: The Quality Assurance Agency carries out subject reviews of provision in departments of higher education institutions. These include an assessment of the quality of teaching and the learning experience of the student. In addition, to reinforce the quality of teaching, the Institute for Learning and Teaching in Higher Education has been set up. Its purpose is to:

enhance the status of teaching in higher education;

maintain and improve the quality of learning and teaching in higher education; set standards of good professional practice that its members, and in due course all those with learning and teaching responsibilities, might follow.

In July 2000, my noble Friend the Minister for Education and Employment in the Lords will award 20 ILT National Teaching Fellowships of £50,000 each. The awards will recognise and reward individual academics who have demonstrated excellence in teaching and support for learning

Teachers' Pay

26. Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on consultation with teachers' representative organisations about changes in their pay arrangements. [119650]

Ms Estelle Morris: Since the publication of the Green Paper, Teachers: meeting the challenge of change (Cm 4164), in December 1998, we have consulted extensively with teacher representatives about the proposed changes to teachers' pay structure. On 2 May, we published a draft of the School Teachers' Pay and Conditions Document 2000 for consultation with statutory consultees including teacher unions.

Classroom Assistants

27. Mr. David Heath: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what his assessment is of the effect of the single status agreement on classroom assistants. [119651]

Ms Estelle Morris: The Government take the view that schools and Local Education Authorities are best placed to decide on matters concerning the pay and conditions of local authority staff. The new Single Status Agreement was agreed nationally by local authority employers and staff unions under the auspices of the Local Government Management Board, but its implementation is being determined at local level.

Disruptive Pupils

28. Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to assist schools in dealing with disruptive pupils. [119652]

Ms Estelle Morris: We are providing more than £500 million over three years, backed up by new guidance on 'Social Inclusion: Pupil Support', to help schools tackle pupils' behavioural problems. From this September we are expanding the Excellence in Cities initiative to 21 additional local education authorities. This will include the provision of additional Learning Mentors and Learning Support Units to help schools better manage disruptive pupils.

In addition, on 27 April my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced £28 million to establish 360 LSUs outside Excellence in Cities areas; £8 million to establish 60 pilot LSUs to serve about 200 primary schools in existing EiC areas; a new £2 million innovation fund with the voluntary sector and employers to provide innovative programmes for excluded pupils and pupils at risk of exclusion; and a new £9 million pupil allowance scheme for secondary schools in EiC areas which accept difficult pupils outside the normal admissions round.

Early Years Child Care

29. Mr. Bill O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what progress has been made in approving the plans submitted by the Early Years Development and Childcare Partnerships. [119653]

Ms Hodge: All 150 Early Years Development and Childcare Partnerships for 2000–01 have now been assessed: 147 have been given full approval; one conditional approval; and three deferred approval.

Sure Start

30. Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on progress in implementing the Sure Start programme. [119654]

Yvette Cooper: I have been asked to reply.

Of the 60 Sure Start trailblazer programmes that were announced in January 1999, 57 have now received approval and are starting to help young children and their families. The remaining three will follow shortly. In November 1999 we launched the second wave of Sure Start by inviting a further 69 areas to start work to develop local programmes. All of these are now working on drawing up their final plans. This brings the number of Sure Start programmes so far announced to 129.

Head Teachers' Pay

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what recent representations he has received on head teachers' pay. [R] [119629]

Ms Estelle Morris: We are engaged in a regular dialogue with representatives of employers and headteachers. The pay arrangements are based on recommendations made by the independent School Teachers' Review Body. We are committed to consulting all key stakeholders before any changes are made. The Government propose to make up to £70 million available over the two years 2000–01 and 2000–02 to support performance-pay awards for heads, as well as for deputies and Advanced Skills Teachers.

Class Sizes

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on class sizes in primary schools since May 1997. [119639]

Ms Estelle Morris: The size of primary classes has gone down in each of the past two years after rising steadily throughout the previous 10 years. In January 1998, the average size of primary classes was 27.7. In January 1999, the figure was 27.5, and in January 2000 it was 27.1. The figure in January 1988 was 25.4.

Age Discrimination

Ms Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps have been taken to publicise the Code on age diversity and to combat age discrimination in employment. [119640]

Ms Hodge: The Code of Practice on Age Diversity in Employment is at the heart of our campaign to tackle age discrimination. The Code was developed with the help of key partners, who are promoting it to their members.

Initial advertising concentrated on personnel professionals and managers. The campaign I launched in February to promote the Code to a wider audience uses billboard posters, national and regional press and commercial radio. Further activities and events will continue until the end of the year.

Early Years Education

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many places are provided by private sector providers in each local education authority as part of their agreed Early Years Childcare and Education Development Partnerships to provide all four-year-olds with an early years education place. [119196]

Ms Hodge [holding answer 14 April 2000]: The following table shows the overall numbers of places for four-year-olds in the private, voluntary and independent sectors by local education authority area from autumn 1998 to spring 2000. Figures are not collected separately on private sector places.

The figures show variations between the school terms reflecting the differing admission arrangements to maintained schools operating in each local education authority area.

New Deal (Disabled People)

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many disabled people have found work through the new deal for the disabled since its inception. [119633]

Ms Hodge: We have been piloting the New Deal for Disabled People since autumn 1998. Our experience shows that for many people on incapacity benefits the journey back to work will be lengthy. I am pleased therefore to be able to say that to the end of March this year some 2,755 people had found employment.

Financial Literacy

Mr. McCabe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps he is taking to improve levels of financial literacy. [119623]

Jacqui Smith: Financial capability is part of the new national guidelines for Personal, Social and Health Education which were issued to schools last year and come into effect this autumn. From the start of the school year 2002, secondary school pupils will also learn about the rights and responsibilities of consumers, employees and employers as part of Citizenship in the National Curriculum. This will be complemented by the work of the Adult Financial Literacy Advisory Group, set up to identify good ideas and existing best practice to give adults the skills and confidence to handle their finances.

National Disability Council

Mrs. Betty Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when the National Disability Council will report on its recent activities. [121250]

Ms Hodge: I am pleased to announce that the National Disability Council's report for 1999–2000 has been laid before Parliament today. The report, copies of which are available in the Library, describes the work of the Council in its final full year of operation. A letter from the Council's Chairman, David Grayson, reporting on activities between 6 April and 24 April has also been laid today. It is also available in the Library.

The work of the Council was subsumed by the Disability Rights Commission when it began operating on 25 April. This report and letter are, therefore, the final reports on the Council's activities. Accordingly, I want to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the hard work and commitment that Mr. Grayson and the Council's members brought to their work. They have made a positive impact and helped improve the lives of disabled people. I am particularly grateful to them for the way in which the Council helped pave the way for the Commission. Because of their good efforts the Commission inherited an exceptionally good base from which to begin its work.

Connexions Service

Mr. Hope: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will publish the prospectus and specification for the Connexions Service. [121261]

Mr. Wicks: I am pleased to announce that the prospectus and specification for the Connexions Service has been published today. Copies are being placed in the Library and will be sent to a wide range of organisations this week including members of the Learning and Skills Committee.

Learning Accounts

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on progress on establishing the national framework for learning accounts. [121279]

Mr. Wicks: Implementation of the national framework is progressing to timetable. Individuals can currently open accounts under local arrangements with Training and Enterprise Councils. From mid-June they will be able to open them through the national framework and use their accounts for learning from September, benefiting from the full range of incentives available to learning account holders. I am pleased to announce that the Department has issued a letter of intent to Capita Group to start the development of these services under the national framework.

School Sixth Forms

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many schools' sixth forms have been (a) closed and (b) opened in each LEA in each of the years 1992–93 to 1999–2000. [119691]

Birth Certificates

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment for what purposes his Department requires a birth certificate to be furnished by (a) employees, (b) contractors, (c) those applying for employment and contracts and (d) other persons. [120321]

Mr. Wills: The Department requests a birth certificate from the following persons:

employees—where there is any doubt about their age, in circumstances where they are being considered for voluntary or compulsory early release or normal age retirement as prescribed by the Principal Civil Service Pension Scheme and the Civil Service Compensation Scheme;

those applying for employment—as reliable evidence of age, nationality and, with other documents, their identity;

others—include those eligible children of members of the Principal Civil Service Pension Scheme who die in service; where positive proof of their lineage is required so they can be paid pension entitlements.

Although the Department does not as a rule request birth certificates from current contractors or those applying for contracts, there have been circumstances, where there is a doubt on age, where a birth certificate has been requested to establish whether their employees are within legal age limits for employment.

Grant-maintained Schools

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the average amount received by (a) former grant-maintained primary schools and (b) former grant-maintained secondary schools as a result of cash protection in 1999–2000 expressed (i) in cash terms and (ii) on a per pupil basis. [120257]

Ms Estelle Morris: The table provides the information requested:

	Average amount per school[1]	Average amount per pupil
Primary schools	16,900	60
Secondary schools	39,800	41

[1] To nearest £100

These figures have been estimated on the basis of information supplied to the Department by local education authorities.

Benefit Entitlement (Over-60s)

Mr. Caplin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he plans to make benefit entitlement for those aged over 60 years dependent on their willingness to take up employment. [120912]

Mr. Blunkett: The Performance and Innovation Unit report, "Winning the Generation Game", published last month made 75 recommendations about improving people's opportunity to contribute to society in their later working years. This included a recommendation that the over-60s exemption from JSA be removed as pension ages are equalised between 2010 and 2020. However, the Government have no plans before then to introduce forms of conditionality for older workers which would move beyond the requirement to attend for interview and advice on employment prospects and benefit from the generous programme of measures we have introduced to make work pay for the over-50s. Consideration of how the recommendations will be implemented will be taken in due course and will seek to build on the clear philosophy and policy already set out by the Government.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Rural Households

Mr. McWalter: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he plans to provide assistance to householders in rural areas of Northern Ireland who do not have access to mains water and sewerage connections. [121114]

Mr. George Howarth: I can announce that from today the reasonable cost limit for connection of an existing property to mains water supplies will be increased from £2,900 to £5,000. The reasonable cost limit for connection to the public sewers will also be increased from £2,300 to £4,000. This will enable nearly a third of all homes at present without running water—an estimated 6,000 in total—to link with the mains water and sewerage systems for the first time.

Technical constraints mean it will still be impossible to connect some remote homes to mains supplies. These homes will continue to rely on private water supplies, some of which may not be entirely satisfactory. I have therefore instructed my officials to explore whether it would be possible to provide some form of assistance to help people who live in these remote dwellings to improve the quality of their private supplies.

The maximum cost allowances available for the connection of new properties to mains water and sewerage services are currently under review. Revised charging guidelines for the provision of water and sewerage infrastructure to new properties will be introduced on 1 January 2001.

In the interim, the current maximum cost allowances of £2,900 for connection to mains water supplies, and £2,300 for connection to public sewerage services will continue to be applied to all properties.

Prison Service

Ms Moran: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the Northern Ireland Prison Service intends to publish its 2000 to 2003 Corporate and Business Plan; and what performance targets have been set for 2000 to 2001. [121115]

Mr. Ingram: The Northern Ireland Prison Service's Corporate and Business Plan for 2000–03 was published today. The following key performance targets have been set for 2000–01:

1. To ensure 100 per cent. security for prisoners in high and top risk categories.
2. To ensure at least 99.5 per cent. security for prisoners in medium and low risk categories.
3. To ensure that the number of assaults by prisoners on staff is less than the 1999–2000 level of 9.4 per 100 prisoners.
4. To ensure that the number of assaults by prisoners on prisoners is less than the 1999–2000 level of 9.5 per 100 prisoners.
5. To achieve an 80 per cent. utilisation of available places in education, and training and employment workshops.
6. To ensure that an average of at least 50 per cent. of the eligible prison population is working to a sentence plan.
7. To evaluate the system of booked visits and, if appropriate, introduce to a second establishment by March 2001.
8. To achieve an average of at least five days development and training per member of staff.
9. To ensure that the average cost per prisoner place does not exceed the range £76,000-£81,000.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Birth Certificates

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs for what purposes his Department requires a birth certificate to be furnished by (a) employees, (b) contractors, (c) those applying for employment and contracts and (d) other persons. [120319]

Mr. Hain: A birth certificate or similar documentary evidence may be required for one or more of the following reasons:

Proof of identity

Proof of eligibility under the Civil Service nationality rules

Proof of age

Kosovo

Ms Kelly: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the supply of demining equipment for use by BACTEC International in Kosovo. [121192]

Mr. Vaz: We have approved the export to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (FRY) of 18 sets of protective body armour and helmets for use by BACTEC International Ltd., an organisation engaged in humanitarian demining activities in Kosovo on behalf of the United Nations Interim Administration in Kosovo (UNMIK).

These goods are on the Military List. UN Security Council resolution UNSCR 1160 (1998) imposed an arms embargo on the FRY. The only exception to this embargo is that in UNSCR 1244 (1999), which provides that prohibitions imposed by UNSCR 1160 shall not apply to the sale or supply of arms and related material for use by the international civil and security presence in Kosovo. We have notified the UN Sanctions Committee of this export and they have raised no objection. The export of the equipment required for demining purposes is not prohibited by the EU arms embargo.

Echelon Surveillance System

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what his policy is on debate within the EU on the Echelon surveillance system. [120774]

Mr. Vaz: Policy on the interception of communications is a matter for member states. There are, however, some areas which may impinge on surveillance and interception related matters, such as data protection, in which the EU has a legitimate interest. It is the long-standing policy of the British Government, as of many other governments, not to comment on alleged interception activity.

International Criminal Court

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received from Governments other than that of the United States concerning the recent US proposal to provide a Supplemental Document and a Rule to Article 98 of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court. [120762]

Mr. Hain: We have received no such representations.

DEFENCE

Richard Hudson

Mr. Todd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he has taken to protect the rights of Mr. Richard Hudson, arrested for a driving offence in Macedonia in August 1999. [118359]

Mr. Spellar: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to him on 11 April 2000, Official Report, column 112W, by the Minster of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain).

Training Ammunition

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the adequacy of the supplies of training ammunition held by Challenger II tanks in Bosnia and Kosovo. [120790]

Mr. Spellar: Challenger II has only recently been introduced to Kosovo and is being introduced to Bosnia shortly. The supplies of training ammunition held by units for use by main battle tanks in Bosnia and Kosovo are entirely adequate for their needs. The facilities and opportunities for training in Bosnia are good, but the operational environment in Kosovo does not currently afford such good opportunities.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Waste Incineration

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to ensure that small incinerators, used for the cremation of pets at pet cemeteries, will not become illegal when the EU Waste Incineration Directive is implemented; and if he will make a statement. [120720]

Mr. Hill: The proposed Waste Incineration Directive is now in the last stages of negotiations. It will not, however, affect existing incinerators for five years, and we are looking at implementation options which will minimise the burden on small animal incinerators, including pet crematoria, while ensuring that there are appropriate environmental safeguards.

RMT Union

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what discussions he has had with the leader of the RMT Union in the last 12 months; [120721]

(2) how many meetings with officials of the RMT Union he has had in the last 12 months; [120722]

(3) how many RMT receptions and events he has attended in the last 12 months. [120724]

Mr. Hill: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Mr. Loughton) on 16 March 2000, Official Report, columns 335–36W.

Aircraft Airworthiness Directives

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions which categories of aircraft are covered by Civil Aviation Authority airworthiness directives issued via the Authority. [120759]

Mr. Mullin: The purpose of airworthiness directives is to specify actions which are necessary to ensure the continuing airworthiness of particular aircraft. An airworthiness directive will normally apply to a specific type of aircraft.

Airworthiness directives will normally be issued by the State which is responsible for the design of an aircraft. The Civil Aviation Authority requires all aircraft on the UK register to comply with airworthiness directives issued by the State of Design. In addition, the CAA may issue airworthiness directives relating to any UK registered aircraft if they believe it necessary for the safe operation of the aircraft.

Ordnance Survey

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what performance targets have been set for the Ordnance Survey Department and Executive Agency in 2000–01. [121081]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The following performance targets have been set for Ordnance Survey in 2000–01:

1. To achieve a revenue target of £82.3 million (excluding the National Interest Mapping Service Agreement).
2. To achieve a return on sales of not less than 5 per cent. (excluding the National Interest Mapping Service Agreement).
3. To ensure that, by 31 March 2001, at least 99.5 per cent. of existing major detail is surveyed and available to customers.
4. To despatch 92 per cent. of small scale product ordered within three working days.
5. OS will achieve efficiency savings across activities associated with collecting and maintaining the data held within the National Topographic Database, producing and distributing products/services to customers and all other associated support activities. The long-term target is to achieve an efficiency gain of 6 per cent. over the period April 2000 to March 2004. The target for 2000–01 is 1.5 per cent.
6. OS recognises the importance of developing its website at www.ordnancesurvey .gov.uk to become the focus for electronic interaction with its customers and public. We intend that by improving the electronic services available for public and specialist users we will increase the number of visits to the Ordnance Survey website, compared with the last half of 1999–2000 by at least 100 per cent. by 31 March 2001.

These targets, some of which are being increased, are closely associated with the key Corporate Aims of Ordnance Survey and demonstrate the Agency's continuing commitment to customers and to improved value for money for all its stakeholders.

Homosexual Malaysian Nationals (Deportation)

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on his policy on deporting Malaysian nationals who are known by the Malaysian authorities to be homosexual. [120749]

Mrs. Roche: Any application by a Malaysian national to enter or remain in the United Kingdom is considered on its individual merits, taking account of the Immigration Rules including the terms of any concessions, information and advice about conditions in Malaysia, and an assessment of any potential risk to the individual.

Prison Adjudications

Sir Peter Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the offences and punishments imposed at adjudications in HM Prisons Ashwell, Camp Hill and Everthorpe from March 1999 to March 2000 or the latest 12 month period available. [120624]

Samar Alami

Sir Peter Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department for what reasons Samar Alami was returned to HM Prison Durham from HM Prison Holloway before she had been able to use all her accumulated visiting time; why this return was made without (a) warning and (b) explanation; and if he will make a statement. [120678]

Mr. Boateng: Samar Alami was returned to Durham prison two days early, before she had completed her accumulated visits, as a result of an administrative error. I am sorry for the inconvenience caused. Ms Alami will be credited with her unused visits and will receive an apology.

Schengen Information System

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 12 April 2000, Official Report, column 236W, concerning the Schengen information system, which treaty, article or protocol provides the EU treaty base for the system. [120742]

Mrs. Roche: The Schengen Information System has not been allocated any specific legal base, and is accordingly deemed to be based on Title VI of the Treaty on European Union, in accordance with Article 2(1), fourth sub-paragraph, of the Schengen Protocol (Protocol No. 2 annexed to the European Communities Treaty and the Treaty on European Union).

General Pinochet

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will institute a review of his decision that General Pinochet was unfit to stand trial in this country following subsequent medical evidence; and if he will make a statement. [120546]

Mr. Straw: I am not aware of any subsequent medical evidence which would call my decision in this case into question.

Prisoners (Average Wages)

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average wage for prisoners who were (a) unemployed, (b) on the basic level of regime, (c) on the standard level of regime and (d) on the enhanced level of regime, in the latest year for which figures are available. [120689]

Mr. Boateng: Above prescribed minimum rates, levels of prisoner pay are set at governor's discretion and will vary depending upon the type of work offered and the regime in place. At present, establishments do not provide headquarters with the information required to answer this question. The multi-faceted nature of regimes in the Prison Service estate means that the collation of these statistics would entail expense beyond acceptable levels.

Vivisection

Dr. Ladyman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the operation of the confidentiality agreement between his Department and the British Union for the Abolition of Vivisection in relation to offences committed under the Protection of Animals Act 1911. [117710]

Mr. Mike O'Brien [pursuant to his reply, 6 April 2000, c. 601–02W]: The word 'enforcing' was inadvertently substituted for the word 'entering' in the final paragraph. The final paragraph should read:

> Although in evidence in the consultation on Freedom of Information, they made representations that the Home Office should have a presumption against entering such an agreement, the BUAV requested such an agreement in connection with this case.

CABINET OFFICE

Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office in how many cases the recommendations of the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration were not implemented by the relevant Government Departments in each of the last five years. [120346]

Marjorie Mowlam: The Government normally accept, and implement, the Parliamentary Ombudsman's recommendations in full. I am not aware of any cases over the past five years where a recommendation made by the Ombudsman has not been implemented by the Department concerned.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Social Housing (Digital TV)

Mr. Colman: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will hold meetings with the local government associations and the Housing Corporation to ensure that communal aerials in social housing are upgraded to enable the tenants to purchase and use digital television and receive an adequate digital signal. [118965]

Janet Anderson: The Government recognise the difficulties which those who rely on shared aerial systems may face in receiving digital transmissions. The ITC, the BBC and the digital broadcasters all provide free advice about the technical solutions available and a number of local authorities have already agreed technical solutions with the digital broadcasters. However, I am arranging to meet representatives of the LGA and the Housing Corporation to draw their attention to this issue, and I will write to my hon. Friend to let him know the outcome of that meeting.

Parliamentary Question

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when he will reply to the question tabled on 7 March by the hon. Member for Westbury concerning the capacity of a venue suitable for staging the World Athletics Championships (ref. 114146). [119044]

Kate Hoey [holding answer 14 April 2000]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave on 2 May 2000, Official Report, column 16W.

HEALTH

Depression (Teenagers)

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to raise awareness of general practitioners of best practice in treating teenagers affected by depression. [119668]

Mr. Hutton: This year £5 million from the National Health Service Modernisation Fund has been allocated to health authorities in order to improve child and adolescent mental health provision at the primary care level.

In addition to maintaining awareness of mental health developments through extensive vocational training and professional development throughout their careers, general practitioners are closely involved in the mental health priorities set out in "Our Healthier Nation", National Priorities Guidance, and the National Service Framework on Mental Health which together underline our commitment to mental health and the role of GPs in its treatment.

Private Management Contracts

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many private management contracts have been awarded within the NHS since May 1997; and if he will list the value of the contracts by NHS region. [118862]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 20 April 2000]: The information requested is shown in the table. It relates to schemes approved since May 1997 under the private finance initiative which have reached financial close with capital values over £1 million.

Region	Number of schemes reached financial close	Capital value (£ million)
Northern and Yorkshire	12	416.54
Trent	7	29.25
Eastern	2	167.90
London	9	405.40
South East	9	182.24
South West	6	117.81
West Midlands	5	181.10
North West	5	89.20
Total	55	1,589.44

Health Records

Mr. Andy King: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what provision exists for NHS patients to dispute factual inaccuracies in their health records. [120745]

Ms Stuart: Under the Data Protection Act 1998 patients have a right to know what is in their health records. If a patient believes that information recorded about them is inaccurate they have a legal right under the Act to request that the inaccurate information is amended or deleted.

Genetically Modified Crops

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 8 March 2000, Official Report, column 744W, on genetically modified crops, if he will list the antibiotics to which marker genes used in the production of genetically modified animal feed convey resistance and the medical uses of those antibiotics. [120723]

Ms Stuart: The antibiotic resistance marker genes in question are among those detailed in the reply given to my hon. Friend on 8 March 2000, Official Report, column 744W, to which she refers. Not all of these marker genes have been used in products capable of use for animal feed. Those which have are listed in the table:

Gene	Antibiotic
Kan (nptII or neo)	Amnioglycoside antibiotics including kanamycin and neomycin
Strep/spec (or aad)	Streptomycin and spectinomycin
Amp (or bla)	Narrow spectrum lactam antibiotics such as ampicillin and amoxycillin

The medical use of these antibiotics is as given in the previous reply.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Regeneration-related Initiative

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will list for each (a) area-based and (b) other regeneration-related initiative for which his Department is responsible (i) the amount budgeted and (ii) the total expended in each financial year for the planned lifetime of each initiative; [119791]

(2) if he will list the number and value of (a) bids for and (b) grants made in each of the last three financial years for which figures are available, for each (i) area-based and (ii) other regeneration-related initiative for which his Department is responsible. [119799]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 20 April 2000]: This Department is not directly responsible for funding regeneration-related initiatives. However, the Department provides substantial support for people living in deprived areas through the benefits system and the range of improvements to the welfare systems since 1997.

Pensioner Incomes

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many pensioners had an income less than £10 above the minimum income guarantee in (a) 1999–2000 and (b) 2000–01; and what is his estimate for 2001–02. [119943]

Mr. Bayley [holding answer 20 April 2000]: Estimates for the years 1999–2000 and 2001–02 are not available. This is because the Departments modelling system cannot make future projections, and producing like for like figures for previous years would involve disproportionate costs due to modelling and data changes between years.

In 2000–01 an estimated 515,000 pensioners have an income of up to £10 above the minimum income guarantee level.

Notes:

1. Figures are in 2000–01 prices and benefit levels.

2. Cases have been rounded to the nearest 5,000.

3. The figure has been calculated using the Pensioner Income Series Data based on the 1997–98 FRS and the Policy Simulation Model (PSM) for Income Related benefits, based on 1997–98 Family Resources Survey data.

4. The Department's Policy Simulation Model is built to represent the baseline situation in mid-2000–01 and is then used to assess the effect of changing policy against that base case. Consequently estimates are only available for the part of the question that relates to this time period.

Carers' Benefits

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to raise carers' benefits taking into account the increase in the minimum wage; and if he will make a statement. [120391]

Mr. Bayley: Invalid Care Allowance is an income maintenance benefit which is paid to help protect the carer from the financial effects of being unable to work full-time. It is not intended to be a carer's wage nor a payment for the services of caring. Its rate, therefore, is not linked to, or dependent on, the National Minimum Wage.

However, we are committed to keeping financial support for carers under review and we are continuing to do this, in the context of follow-up work to the National Carers' Strategy, and our response to the Royal Commission on Long Term Care.

TREASURY

Birth Certificates

Mr. Caton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for what purposes his Department requires a birth certificate to be furnished by (a) employees, (b) contractors, (c) those applying for employment and contracts and (d) other persons. [120311]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Each of the Chancellor's Departments and agencies (HM Treasury, HM Customs and Excise, Inland Revenue, National Savings, Office for National Statistics, Royal Mint, Government Actuary, Debt Management Office and Valuation Office Agency) requires, as part of the basic check on new employees, some evidence of identity; age (for pensions purposes); and of the right to work in the UK. Such evidence depends upon whether or not the applicant is a UK or EC national but might be provided from a combination of different documents including a full British passport, P45, valid British driving licence, birth certificate, proof of residence at a given address, etc, or (where relevant) a full EC or other national passport; an identity card issued by an EC country; or other proof of immigration status and/or the right to work. Most Departments also require contractors to make checks similar to the basic check on their employees.

Birth certificates, as evidence of identity, are not required to be furnished by other persons.

Annuities

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the results of the review by the Inland Revenue of the income drawdown arrangements for annuities; and if he will make a statement. [120201]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Changes to simplify the administration of income drawdown where purchase of an annuity from a personal pension scheme has been deferred were announced in a press release issued on 7 April 2000 by the Department of Social Security and the Inland Revenue. These changes reflect representations made during the recent Inland Revenue review and will be implemented in the current Finance Bill along with amendments to secondary legislation.

Privatisation

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the privatisations since 1979 together with the number and percentage of shares allocated to the employees at the date of privatisation and the number and percentage of shares so held (a) one year after privatisation and (b) three years after privatisation. [120618]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The Government have not collected information on the number and percentage of shares held by employees in privatised companies either at the time of privatisation or since then. Such information could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Voicemail

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Chairman of the Information Committee what was the total cost of the installation of voicemail in (a) Norman Shaw North and (b) other parliamentary buildings; what performance targets have been set for the operation of the system; and how many performance targets have been missed and on how many occasions in the last 12 months. [119853]

Mr. Allan: The Information Committee endorsed the House-wide introduction of the CCTA/Global Crossing Voice Mail service at its meeting of 10 May 1999. The cost of the service in 1999–2000 was around £92,000. The costs cannot be broken down by building as the system is a function of the central parliamentary switchboard which does not require the installation of local equipment.

The day to day performance of the system and associated targets are operational matters for the Head of Telecommunications. I have therefore asked him to respond directly to the hon. Member on the performance of the system against target.

Susan Hamilton Secretarial Agency

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee in respect of the Susan Hamilton Secretarial Agency, what rent is paid for the accommodation it occupies in the House; what the terms of the tenancy are; when the (a) rent and (b) tenancy is next subject to review; if it will be subject to tender; and what the ratio is of Members of the House of (i) Lords to (ii) Commons who use it. [119854]

Sir Sydney Chapman: This is a matter for the Serjeant at Arms; I have asked him to write to the hon. Member.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Gambia

Mr. McDonnell: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will review the Government's aid to the Government of The Gambia following the recent deaths of demonstrators in pro-democracy marches. [120302]

Clare Short: We remain deeply concerned at the death and injury of students in the demonstrations on 10 and 11 April. The UK made immediate representations to the Government of The Gambia protesting at the handling of the demonstrations. A Coroners Inquest is already sitting and a full Commission of Inquiry is being set up to establish responsibility for the events. We continue to monitor the situation closely and urge the Government of The Gambia to ensure the inquiry is independently led, transparent, and free from political interference.

Since the resumption of our development programme in The Gambia in 1998, we have committed over £4 million to projects through government and civil society, aimed at improved governance, social inclusion, education management and capacity building for community based organisations. We are keeping the programme under constant review in the light of the Government's policies for the reduction of poverty, and respect for human rights.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Regulation of Investigatory Powers Bill

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on his policy in respect of the use his Department, its agencies and public bodies will make of the powers relating to the authorised obtaining of communications data in Part I, Chapter II of the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Bill once the Bill is enacted. [119511]

Mr. Wills: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department on 19 April 2000, Official Report, column 509W.

Learning and Skills Council

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the (a) estimated (i) capital and (ii) revenue cost of establishing and (b) projected staffing establishment of each local arm of the Learning and Skills Council in England for each of the next three years. [119254]

Mr. Wicks: (a) Estimates of the capital and revenue costs of establishing each local Council are not available as these will depend on the outcome of individual negotiations in each area to secure premises and to establish teams of staff. We estimate the total transitional costs of moving to the new arrangements to be some £60 million to £65 million over the next two years (2000–02). Overall, we estimate that the new arrangements will from 2001–02 produce savings in administration of at least £50 million per year compared with the current position.

(b) Projections of the staff numbers in each local Council for each of the next three years are not available since these matters will be determined by the Learning and Skills Council itself when it comes into being. However, for planning purposes we estimate that local Councils will on average have 80–90 staff.

Sixth Forms (Funding)

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much each local education authority has spent per sixth form pupil in each of the last five years. [120256]

Mr. Wicks: Although local education authorities produce budget and outturn statements for their expenditure on schools, information is not recorded in the form requested.

Standards Fund (Further Education)

Mr. Michael J. Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what was the total amount of Standards Fund expenditure allocated to further education in each year since June 1997–98 in England and Wales; [120597]

(2) if he will list the allocation of Standards Fund expenditure to further education by recipient in each year since 1997–98 for England and Wales; [120598]

Mr. Wicks: The FE Standards Fund in England was introduced in April 1999. £35 million was allocated for 1999–2000; £98 million is earmarked for 2000–01 and £160 million for 2001–02.

The data requested are as follows for 1999–2000:

FE Colleges	31,639,796
Other developmental expenditure (governor/principal training)	440,682
Basic Skills Quality Programme	350,000
Further Education National Training Organisation	500,000
Further Education Development Agency	1,750,000
Standards Fund Evaluation	300,000

A breakdown of the allocations provided to individual colleges has been placed in the Library.

The Standards Fund expenditure allocated to further education in Wales is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Further and Higher Education

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to improve the pay and conditions of part-time lecturers in further and higher education. [121069]

Mr. Wicks: Pay and conditions for FE and HE staff are an important issue, although the detailed arrangements are for employers to determine. We have increased the funding for higher education by over £1 billion over the four years to 2001–02. And we have made the biggest ever investment in FE, increasing funds from £3.1 billion in 1998–99 to £3.9 billion in 2001–02. We are encouraging employers and unions to work together on a sensible way forward under the improved circumstances we have created.

Careers Service

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment which Careers Service contractors hold (a) a Charter Mark, (b) an Investors in People award and (c) an International Standards Organisation registration. [120779]

Disability Discrimination Act

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when the remaining provisions of Part III of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 will be implemented; and if he will make a statement. [121312]

Ms Hodge: We have decided that the final stage of Part III of the Disability Discrimination Act should come into force on 1 October 2004. From that date, in addition to their current duties, service providers will have to take reasonable steps to remove, alter or provide a reasonable means of avoiding physical features which make it impossible or unreasonably difficult for disabled people to use a service.

I asked the National Disability Council to review the existing Code of Practice to take account of this final stage of the duties on service providers. A revised version of the Code and a Practical Guide for service providers were handed over to the Disability Rights Commission when it began operating on 25 April. Public consultation on the revised Code of Practice and Guide, and the Government's proposals for a small number of Regulations under the Act, starts on 8 May and will last for three months.

The Commission will consider the views expressed in the consultation before preparing final versions of the Code and Guide.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Harmon v. House of Commons Corporate Officer

Mr. Baker: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission, if he will place in the Library a copy of the report by Sir Thomas Legg and Mr. Peter Bosworth on the case of Harmon v. House of Commons Corporate Officer. [120780]

Mr. Kirkwood: I refer the hon. Gentleman to my answer to the hon. Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe) on 19 April 2000, Official Report, column 502W, in which I said that the action is still sub judice. The Commission has decided not to release the report at present.

DEFENCE

Low Flying

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the lowest operational attitude at which the C130J aircraft is cleared to fly in the RAE. [120410]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 3 May 2000]: While the C130J is being introduced into service and development of its full tactical capability continues, the lowest operational altitude for which it is cleared is 2000 ft, except for take-off, visual circuits, instrument approaches and landings. Clearance for low level operation will follow when trials work is complete.

HEALTH

Regulation of Investigatory Powers Bill

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on his policy in respect of the use his Department, its agencies and public bodies will make of the powers relating to the authorised obtaining of communications data in Part I, Chapter II of the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Bill once the Bill is enacted. [119518]

Ms Stuart: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given by the Home Secretary on 19 April 2000, Official Report, column 509W.

Deafblind People

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to include standards relevant to the provision of domiciliary services to deafblind people, including communicator-guide and intervenor services, in the domiciliary care standards under development by his Department. [120414]

Mr. Hutton: We are currently considering the needs of all those receiving domiciliary services with a view to publishing a consultation document later this year. The standards will be the minimum core standards required for registration with the National Care Standards Commission. However, providers should be able to demonstrate that appropriate personal care is delivered to the required standards.

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to consult deafblind users of domiciliary care services, including communicator-guide and intervenor services, in relation to the setting of domiciliary care standards. [120415]

Mr. Hutton: We are currently considering the needs of all those receiving domiciliary care services with a view to publishing a consultation document later this year. A core steering group and a wider reference group have developed the draft national minimum standards and a User Forum was held in January 2000.

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to include standards relevant to deafblind people in the care standards for residential services for adults. [120416]

Mr. Hutton: We are planning to include standards relevant to deafblind people in the national standards for care homes for adults with disabilities and special needs. Relevant interests have been consulted. The standards are being drafted and will be published for consultation later this year.

Social Services

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the (a) spending per head on social services was in each of the last three years and (b) standard spending assessment per head for social services was in each of the last three years and is for 2000–01, in (i) Devon and (ii) England. [120828]

Mr. Hutton: The available information is given in the table.

	Gross expenditure on personal social services per head of population[1]		Standard spending assessment[2] for personal social services per head of population[1]
	Devon[3]	England	Devon[3]	England
1996–97	191	189	131	141
1997–98	206	203	142	150
1998–99	210	219	141	158
1999–2000	—	—	147	167
2000–01	—	—	155	176

[1] Mid year population estimates with 1998 mid year estimate used also for 1999–2000 and 2000–01.

[2] On 1 April 1998 Plymouth and Torbay became separate unitary authorities; expenditure in these areas is included in the Devon expenditure and SSAs for 1996–97 and 1997–98 but excluded from the Devon expenditure and SSAs for 1998–99 onwards.

[3] Standard Spending Assessments (SSAs) are not comparable with actual expenditure. SSAs represent the unhypothecated resources provided to local authorities for social services. They include any expenditure funded from charges or from Department of Health grants or other grants.

Correspondence

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will reply to the letter dated 2 December 1999 from the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed about access to specialist alcohol services in the North-East. [121065]

Mr. Hutton: My right hon. Friend replied to the right hon. Member on 4 May.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Fire Service

Mrs. Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to publish the report of the inquiry into the machinery for determining firefighters' conditions of service. [121340]

Mr. Straw: I announced in the reply I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley (Kali Mountford), on 12 April 2000, Official Report, column 226W, that I had received professor Burchill's recommendations and was consulting upon them. I very much welcome his proposals for improving the working of the National Joint Council for Local Authorities' Fire Brigades and the positive reaction there has been to them. I have now arranged for the report of the inquiry to be published today as a Command Paper and for copies to be placed in the Library. I am asking for further comments from interested parties on the detail of the report and its recommendations to reach me by the end of this month.

Criminal Records Bureau

Mr. Donald Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to publish the Criminal Records Bureau Corporate and Business Plans. [121341]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I have today published the Criminal Records Bureau Corporate and Business plans for 2000–05, and copies have been placed in the Library.

UK Passport Agency

Mr. Savidge: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to publish the UK Passport Agency's Corporate and Business Plans. [121342]

Mr. Straw: I have today published the United Kingdom Passport Agency's Corporate and Business Plans and copies have been placed in the Library.

Demonstrations

Dr. Jack Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what powers he has to ban demonstrations by individuals and organisations with records of violent conduct, destruction of property and vandalism; and if he will make a statement. [121000]

Mr. Straw: Under section 13 of the Public Order Act 1986, a chief officer of police may apply to the district council for an order prohibiting marches or processions which he reasonably believes may result in serious public disorder, serious damage to property or serious disruption to the life of the community. Such an order requires my consent. In London, the Commissioners of Police may apply direct to me as Home Secretary for such consent. The chief officer may also attach conditions to such marches and to public assemblies. There is no power to prohibit peaceful public assemblies.

Section 14A of the 1986 Act similarly enables a chief officer to apply for and order prohibiting trespassory assemblies within a specified area, if he reasonably believes that such an assembly may result in serious disruption to the life of the community or in significant damage to land or buildings of historical, architectural, archaeological or scientific importance. This power applies only to areas to which the public has no right of access or only to a limited right of access.

Such bans do not apply to specified individuals or groups, but in considering applications I will give due weight to the police assessment of the potential for disorder or disruption to the community, including any available information on the groups likely to be involved.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Ethiopia

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development when she expects the famine relief funded by her Department to be distributed in Ethiopia. [118816]

Mr. Foulkes: Since January, we have committed over 24,000 metro tonnes (MT) of food aid to be provided through the ICRC and international non-governmental organisations. Most of this has been distributed or is in the process of being distributed. The distribution of the remaining 5,400MT is expected to start at the beginning of June.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what discussions she has had with her EU and UN counterparts concerning the use of the Lokichokio World Food Programme airfield in Northern Kenya for providing assistance to Ethiopia. [120767]

Mr. Foulkes [holding answer 4 May 2000]: The World Food Programme have no plans at present to use Lokichokio airfield. If a large scale air operation is needed WFP would consider Lokichokio among a number of options. Its use would depend on its cost effectiveness.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list the long-term development aid projects her Department supports in Ethiopia; and if she will make a statement. [120768]

Mr. Foulkes [holding answer 4 May 2000]: Our bilateral development programme is currently running at about £4 million to £5 million a year. We are supporting the following activities:

Police Training

Public Expenditure Review/Poverty Reduction Strategy Paper

Governance Fund

Technical Co-operation Training Programme

Ethiopian Roads Authority Contract Capacity Building

EU Food Security/Employment Generation Schemes Expert

DFID Food Security Field Manager

Support to the Ethiopian Food Security Reserve

Review of the Ethiopian Food Security Reserve

Community Water Development Project—Phase II (Save the Children Fund)

Review of Rehabilitation Programme (Overseas Development Institute)

Prevention and Independent Monitoring of Disposal of Obsolete Pesticides

DPPC Food Aid Targeting Guidelines Preparation (Save the Children Fund)

Rapid Appraisal of Pastoral Emergency Response Interventions

DFID Small Grants Scheme.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how much her Department has contributed to the UN appeal for Ethiopia launched in January; and on what dates her Department provided the funds. [120765]

Mr. Foulkes [holding answer 4 May 2000]: Both the UN Appeal and the Government of Ethiopia Appeal in January 2000 identify priorities for assistance. The £7.3 million we have committed since January 2000 is targeted on these priorities.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the amount of food aid necessary to replenish Ethiopia's food reserves; and how much food aid was pledged by the EU to Ethiopia's food reserves in (a) 1998, (b) 1999 and (c) 2000. [120763]

Mr. Foulkes [holding answer 4 May 2000]: We understand that the physical stock in the Reserve currently stands at 90,000 metric tonnes (MT) of food. The United States, World Food Programme and the EU expect to provide a further 200,000MT by the end of July. The EU have pledged 110,000MT for the Food Reserve, which will be delivered by July 2001. The EU repaid 89,267MT to the Food Reserve in 1998 and 61,293MT in 1999.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what recent discussions she has had with her EU counterparts concerning the provision of food aid to replenish Ethiopia's reserve stocks. [120757]

Mr. Foulkes [holding answer 4 May 2000]: Our officials have been in close contact with EU officials to monitor the replenishment of Ethiopia's reserve stock. At January 2000 the EU owed 84,000 metric tonnes (MT). They have since repaid 16,000MT and are confident that they will be able to repay the total amount by the end of July this year.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development which long-term development aid projects her Department supports in Zimbabwe; and if she will make a statement. [120766]

We have suspended the following project:

Land Rovers for Zimbabwe Republic Police (£8.41 million: 1998–2001).

We are keeping the Zimbabwe programme activities under constant review to ensure that projects can remain effective in current circumstances.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will publish details of trade and aid projects her Department has approved for Zimbabwe between (a) June 1997 and December 1997, (b) January 1998 and December 1998 and (c) January 1999 and April 2000; and if she will make a statement. [120758]

Mr. Foulkes [holding answer 4 May 2000]: The Aid and Trade Provision was closed to new applications when this Government took office in May 1997. Only one outstanding project has been approved for Zimbabwe since May 1997, and no others are under consideration. This project, initiated by the previous administration but approved in September 1998, was for the supply of 1,500 Land Rover Defenders to the Zimbabwe Republic Police. It was suspended in April 2000 since the conditions of the grant are not currently being met by the Zimbabwe Government.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Motorways

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what percentage of motorway route miles in England are unlit; what plans he has to increase the provision of motorway lighting; and if he will make a statement. [120080]

Mr. Hill: Approximately 70 per cent. of the motorway network in England is unlit.

Lighting is provided in high accident areas. The decision on whether to provide lighting is based on an assessment carried out in accordance with the DETR "New Approach to Appraisal". This covers an economic assessment of the capital, maintenance and energy costs against the potential savings as a result of the reduction in night time personal injury accidents; and an assessment of environmental impacts.

Apart from this, there is no programme to extend road lighting to unlit sections of motorway. The situation is kept under review.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many people have been killed in road accidents on motorway hard shoulders in each of the last five years for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement. [120078]

Mr. Hill: The data requested are given in the table.

Casualties killed on entering or leaving a hard shoulder of motorway: Great Britain 1994–98

	On lay-by/hard shoulder	Entering lay-by/hard shoulder	Leaving lay-by/hard shoulder	All hard shoulder
1994	8	0	3	11
1995	8	3	0	11
1996	7	3	0	10
1997	4	0	1	5
1998	13	3	1	17

Health and Safety Executive

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is the ratio of field inspectors to policy inspectors in the Health and Safety Executive. [120388]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 2 May 2000]: HSE has no "policy inspectors" as such. The ration of field inspectors to inspectors employed in non-field posts in the Health and Safety Executive is around 7:1.

OSPAR Conference (Copenhagen)

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will consult with hon. Members on the United Kingdom strategy for the June 2000 OSPAR Conference in Copenhagen, prior to finalising the UK submission. [120711]

Mr. Meacher: I have regularly set out in a written parliamentary answer the main lines which the United Kingdom delegation will take at the annual meetings of the OSPAR Commission for the protection of the marine environment of the North East Atlantic. I intend to continue this practice for the next annual meeting in June in Copenhagen. If any hon. Members have any points that they would wish the Government to take into account in this context, I shall be glad if they will let me know, so that I can consider them. I would be happy to receive a delegation of MPs to discuss this.

East Coast Main Line

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will instruct the Franchising Director to take particular account when granting the franchise for the East Coast main line, of companies which propose to increase the number of direct train services between Hull and London. [120646]

Mr. Hill: The Instructions and Guidance the Deputy Prime Minister gave the Franchising Director in September last year set out six criteria for him to take into consideration when assessing bids for new franchises. They are: the commitment of existing franchise operators to performance, customer services, innovation, investment and efficiency; the extent to which extra or earlier investment can be obtained; the extent to which better performance can be secured; the extent to which integrated transport measures can be achieved; the extent to which passengers will be given a greater voice in the level and standard of services and; affordability and value for money to the tax payer. The Franchising Director announced on 14 March the shortlisted bidders for the East Coast Main Line franchise. I understand that he is having separate discussions about improved services to Hull.

North Wales Main Line

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions further to his answer of 18 April, Official Report, column 456W, on the North Wales Main Line, if he will place a copy of the study produced by Virgin Trains in March 1999 in the Library. [120730]

Mr. Hill: [holding answer 2 May 2000]: The study was in fact produced in March 1998. I am unable to place a copy in the Library as it remains commercially confidential.

Groundwater Charges

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the amount that British farmers have paid in groundwater charges in each of the years since the charge was introduced; and what his forecast is of the figures for the current year and each of the next three years. [120563]

Mr. Mullin [holding answer 3 May 2000]: During the transitional period of the Groundwater Regulations 1998, from 1 January to 31 March 1999, the Environment Agency received over 12,000 applications from farmers in England and Wales for groundwater authorisations representing a total of around £1 million. From 1 April 1999 to 31 March 2000 the Agency received a further 131 applications amounting to total charges of around £12,000. Around £870,000 has been paid by farmers to the Agency as annual "maintenance" charges in respect of authorisations. This will be reimbursed following the announcement, in March, of the Government's Agriculture Strategy. The total charges payable for the current and subsequent years will depend on the number of applications made by farmers for authorisations, though the Agency's current estimates would indicate total charges to farmers for new applications of up to £300,000 for 2000–01. The administration of the Regulations in Scotland is a matter for the Scottish Executive.

Car-free Sundays

Mr. Dobbin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans his Department has to encourage cities to introduce car-free Sundays. [120842]

Mr. Hill: None.

Correspondence

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will reply to the letter dated 14 December 1999 from the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, regarding the proposals to introduce cabinet-style committees in the National Park Authority. [121064]

Mr. Meacher: I replied to the right hon. Member on 4 May.

FV Gaul

Ms Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the reports he commissioned into (a) the efforts previously made by the Department to locate the wreck of the FV Gaul and (b) the results of the examination of graves found in Northern Russia will be published. [121343]

Mr. Prescott: Both of the reports by Roger Clarke, formerly Director of Shipping and Ports in my Department, are published today and copies have been placed in the Library of the House.

Roger Clarke's report on the Department's previous efforts to locate the wreck of the Gaul identifies lapses of corporate memory both in my Department and in the Ministry of Defence, in the latter instance following the destruction of files. We deeply regret these mistakes, and any distress they may have caused, particularly to the families of those lost with the Gaul.

Roger Clarke makes a number of recommendations on these and other matters regarding the location and examination of marine casualties. We intend to act on all his recommendations, and our responses to each of them have also been placed in the Library.

His second report deals with the investigation of a number of graves in Northern Russia which may have contained the remains of victims of the Gaul. DNA samples were taken but no match has been found. Roger Clarke's report details the way this onerous investigation was undertaken. Details which identify those who provided DNA samples have been deleted from the published report.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

World Class Performance

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will set targets for the world class performance sportsmen and women for the Sydney 2000 Olympics, and publish them before 1 September. [121042]

Kate Hoey: It is not for Ministers to set such targets. We have asked UK Sport for information and I will write to my hon. Friend as soon as it is available, placing copies of my letter in the Library.

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) how many athletes who gained world class performance status in 1999 achieved personal best performances at the World Athletics Championships in 1999; [121040]

(2) how much money has been spent on the world class performance programme by Sport England and the UK Sports Council (a) since it was introduced and (b) per sport; [121041]

(3) which sportsmen and women have qualified for world class performance status for 1999 and 2000; and which of them have since achieved a new best performance where that can be measured. [121039]

Kate Hoey: We have contacted UK Sport to request the information required, and I will write to my hon. Friend as soon as it is available, placing copies of my letter in the Library.

TREASURY

VAT

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many businesses in the north-west (a) registered and (b) deregistered for VAT in each year since 1992. [119847]

Dawn Primarolo: The number of businesses in the north-west which registered and deregistered for VAT since 1992 is as follows:

Calendar year	Registrations	Deregistrations
1992	17,326	21,370
1993	16,412	20,752
1994	15,174	18,600
1995	18,699	17,154
1996	18,269	14,196

Working Families Tax Credit

Mr. Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will desegregate by income decile the number of families receiving (a) 0 to 10 per cent., (b) 11 to 20 per cent., (c) 21 to 30 per cent., (d) 31 to 40 per cent., (e) 41 to 50 per cent., (f) 51 to 60 per cent. and (g) 61 to 70 per cent. of child care costs through the Working Families Tax Credit. [120608]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 2 May 2000]: Insufficient data on income are provided by applicants for the Working Families Tax Credit (WFTC) to allocate them between decile groups of income as conventionally defined for such analyses. Also, household survey data available for analysis do not yet cover families receiving the tax credits, and sample numbers may in any case be too small for reliable estimates to be made in the detail requested.

Mr. Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if in (a) the initial determination and (b) each subsequent determination of a working families tax credit claim the (i) number and (ii) age of children is checked against child benefit records. [120054]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 20 April 2000]: The number and ages of children from child benefit records can be checked by officers assessing any application for WFTC, and this is normally done if child benefit information is omitted from the WFTC application form, or if conflicting information has been supplied by the WFTC applicant.

Treasury Building

Mrs. Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what progress has been made on the refurbishment of the Treasury building. [121311]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Ministerial approval of plans for the refurbishment of the Treasury building under the private finance initiative was announced by the former Chief Secretary on 27 July 1999, Official Report, columns 400–01. Under the terms of the project agreement signed last year, the Treasury's private sector partner, Exchequer Partnership plc (EP), is responsible for a number of risks, including obtaining town planning and listed building consents and securing the funding to finance the works. Both conditions have now been satisfied and the deal has therefore reached financial close. Work is planned to start on site on 17 July (the date of granting vacant possession of the Park end of the building) with completion in August 2002.

The contract, which is for 37 years and one month from vacant possession, provides for the Treasury to pay an annual payment (the Unitary Payment) to EP in return for fully serviced accommodation to performance standards specified in advance. The Unitary Payment has been fixed in real terms at £14.037 million in March 1999 prices and will be uprated annually in line with the retail prices index.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Rover

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about the progress made by the Rover Task Force. [121344]

Mr. Byers: The Rover Task Force has published its interim report, which is available in the Libraries of the House and the Vote Office. A final report is expected to be published by the end of June.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if the Government have sought EU approval for paying rescue aid to a bidder for Rover. [120826]

Mr. Byers: No requests for aid has been received in respect of a bid for Rover.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether the Regional Selective Assistance originally proposed for BMW/Rover will be available for new projects in the West Midlands to replace Longbridge employment. [120855]

Mr. Byers: When I set up the Rover Task Force on 17 March, I announced that a Government contribution of £129 million, which was originally offered to BMW in the form of Regional Selective Assistance, will now be available to support other, good quality projects in the region.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what assessment he has made of the level of financial backing possessed by the Tower bid for Rover; [120854]

(2) what recent estimate he has made of the extent of job losses (a) under the Alchemy bid, (b) under the Tower bid and (c) in the event of closure of the Rover plant at Longbridge. [120853]

Mr. Byers: The details of any successful bid for Rover, and hence the effects on employment, will not be known until agreement is finally reached with BMW.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the Government's policy is towards the (a) Alchemy and (b) Towers consortium bids for Longbridge. [120827]

Mr. Byers: The Government have consistently stated that we want to see the best possible deal for Rover workers, suppliers and dealers.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assurances the Government have received from BMW about (a) the future of the Rover plant at Cowley and (b) the timing of the sale or closure of the Longbridge plant. [120825]

Mr. Byers: The future of Longbridge is the subject of commercial negotiations at the moment. BMW has stated that the future of its operations at Cowley are secure.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what estimate he has made of the amount of money needed from (a) all sources and (b) public funds to continue Rover production at Longbridge; [120857]

(2) what rescue aid the Government are prepared to offer for Rover. [120858]

Mr. Byers: Commercial negotiations are still continuing over the future of Rover Group, including future production at Longbridge. No request for Government financial support has been received from any party to the negotiations.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if the Towers Consortium has (a) applied for regional selective assistance or other Department's grants or (b) indicated to his Department that it will be applying. [120549]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 2 May 2000]: No application for Government grants or aid, or indication of a forthcoming application, has been received from the Towers Consortium.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many (a) meetings and (b) conversations he has had with (i) the principals and (ii) other representatives of (1) Alchemy Partners, (2) the Towers Consortium and (3) BMW since 31 March. [120092]

Mr. Byers: A number of meetings and conversations have taken place.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if the regional selective assistance offered to BMW/Rover was intended to cover revenue losses. [120821]

Mr. Byers: No.

Select Committee Report

Mr. Bruce George: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recommendations made by the Trade and Industry Committee in its seventh report of 1995–96 have been (a) implemented and (b) are in the process of being implemented. [119781]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 20 April 2000]: Of the 12 recommendations, those implemented comprise numbers 1, 2 and 11. Recommendation numbers 8 and 12 are in the process of being implemented.

Respiratory Diseases (Compensation)

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the locations of the medical assessment centres in Scotland being used for conducting (a) spirometry and (b) other tests required in connection with the payment of compensation for respiratory diseases. [120793]

Mrs. Liddell: Spirometry testing has been conducted at four centres in Scotland, in Edinburgh, Glasgow, Lochore (Fife) and Drongan (Ayr). In addition to the 4,080 spirometry assessment carried out at centres, the Department has also assessed 346 claimants in their homes.

The centres at Edinburgh, Glasgow and Lochore have now been fully adapted for the more detailed medical requirements of the main Medical Assessment Process (MAP), along with a new centre in Ayr itself. The future needs for additional MAP centres will be kept under review.

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the annual costs were of the medical assessment centres in Scotland used to provide medical tests to compensation claimants suffering respiratory diseases in each of the last three years. [120794]

Mrs. Liddell: In March last year, the DTI awarded the contract to carry out the national programme of spirometry to Healthcall Services Limited. To date DTI have paid Healthcall £155,090 in fees to test claimants in Scotland.

Enterprise Fund

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what payments have been made in 1999–2000 under the Enterprise Fund announced in the 1998 White Paper; [121007]

(2) for what reason total provision for the Enterprise Fund given on page 198 of Cm 4611 differs from estimated outturn given on page 41. [121006]

Mr. Byers: The net estimated outturn for the Enterprise Fund in 1999–2000 (£48.5 million on page 41 of Cm. 4611) is consistent with the figures shown on page 198 (£57.88 million) which are gross, and from which must be deducted the figures for the Small Firms Loan Guarantee Scheme Premium Receipts and Recoveries shown on page 199 (£9.38 million).

Total actual payments in 1999–2000 under the Enterprise Fund, updated since the publication of the estimates in the Expenditure Plan Report, were £38.62 million (gross).

Ford

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the output of cars at Ford's Dagenham plant in the last 12 months. [120996]

Mr. Byers: In 1999 the Dagenham plant produced 190,977 vehicles.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has received a grant application from Ford for its Dagenham plant. [120815]

Mr. Byers: No.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what estimate he has made of potential job losses at Dagenham if Ford ceased car manufacture there; [120822]

(2) what his policy is on proposals to take over car manufacture at Dagenham; [120994]

(3) what discussions he has had with Ford about the ending of car making at its Dagenham plant; [120816]

(4) what recent discussions he has had with Ford concerning competitiveness in car manufacturing in (a) Germany and (b) the UK. [120995]

Mr. Byers: I and my officials maintain regular and close contacts with Ford on a whole range of issues.

Ford is currently undertaking a review on the whole of their European operations. The outcome of the review is not known and no announcements are expected until after the review has been completed. Any comment at this stage on possible implications for any of Ford's UK operations would therefore be premature and counterproductive.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has (a) to aid and (b) make grants to Dagenham in the event of car manufacture ceasing there. [120824]

Mr. Byers: Ford is currently undertaking a review on the whole of its European operations. The outcome of the review is not known and no announcements are expected until after the review has been completed. Any comment at this stage on possible implications for any of Ford's UK operations would therefore be premature and counterproductive.

Motor Distribution

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions he (a) has had in the last two months and (b) plans in the next three months with the EU over the block exemption of motor distribution from the competition regime. [120811]

Mr. Byers: My officials have discussed the issues raised by the cars block exemption with their counterparts in the Commission's Competition Directorate on several occasions in the past two months. They intend to remain in close contact with the European Commission in the coming months on this issue. I have also raised the matter personally with Commissioner Monti and will continue to do so.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he plans to announce the changes required in motor car distribution following the Competition Commission report. [120814]

Mr. Byers: I announced my proposals on 10 April when I published the Competition Commission report on the supply of new cars.

Coal Industry

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry under which programmes he plans to pay grant to the coal industry in the next two years. [120817]

Mr. Byers: As this is a new scheme, a separate programme will be established.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he plans to discuss grants to the coal industry with the EU. [120818]

Mr. Byers: Discussions have already taken place and will continue.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he will announce the amount of grant that is available for the coal industry over the next two years; and what factors will determine the level of grant to be paid. [120819]

Mr. Byers: I refer the right hon. Member to my statement to the House on 17 April 2000, Official Report, column 697.

Regional Selective Assistance

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry for what reason the planned expenditure on regional selective assistance for 2000–01 given on page 62 of Cm 4611 differs from total provision given on page 201. [121002]

Mr. Byers: The total gross provision for regional selective assistance in 2000–01 given on page 201 of Cm 4611 (£125.25 million) includes provision for the Enterprise Grant scheme. The figures on page 62 have been separated into individual lines on the Enterprise Grant scheme (£9.0 million) and the main Regional Selective Assistance programme (£116.3 million).

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) how much of the difference between total provision of, and estimated outturn spending on, regional selective assistance in 1999–2000 results from the delay in agreeing a legal regional selective assistance map; [121003]

(2) for what reason the estimated outturn spending on regional selective assistance given on page 62 of Cm 4611 differs from the total provision given on page 201. [121001]

Mr. Byers: I refer the right hon. Gentleman to footnote (a) on page 62 of Cm 4611 which states that the difference resulted from a number of large projects failing to reach their trigger points for grant because of slower than expected progress.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many of the offers of regional selective assistance cited on page 59 of Cm 4611 have been delayed by the absence of a legal regional selective assistance map. [121005]

Mr. Byers: None.

Nuclear Industry

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent estimate he has made of the cost of returning unused plutonium MOX fuel from Japan; which Government Departments are responsible for making arrangements for such a return; and what storage facilities exist at (a) Sellafield and (b) other UK nuclear facilities to store such fuel. [120254]

Mrs. Liddell: A decision on the future of the MOX fuel in Japan remains to be agreed with the Japanese Government.

Electricity Generation

Mr. Stunell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate he has made of the impact on carbon emissions of the Restricted Consents Policy for new gas-fired electricity generation (a) for the last two years, and (b) for the next two years. [119677]

Mrs. Liddell: No such calculations have been made.

Our White Paper, "Conclusions of The Review of Energy Sources for Power Generation and Government response to fourth and fifth Reports of the Trade and Industry Committee", Cm 4071, stated that it was not possible to quantify the impact of the new energy framework on emissions. This is because the aim of the policy is not to achieve any particular outcome in terms of fuel mix in generation, but to create a level playing field so that all forms of generation can compete equally and as a temporary precautionary measure to ensure the artificial encouragement for new gas plant that has arisen from distortions to the electricity market does not artificially undermine security and diversity of supply.

I announced on Monday 17 April that I would be lifting the stricter consents policy in October 2000 as soon as the new electricity trading arrangements were in place. The Government are determined to meet the UK commitment to reduce greenhouse gas emissions to 12.5 per cent. below 1990 levels in 2008–12. The stricter consents policy and the timetable for its lifting are entirely consistent with meeting that target, and with moving towards our goal of reducing carbon dioxide emissions by 20 per cent. on 1990 levels.

Assisted Areas (North-East)

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will state (a) the resident unemployment and (b) the number of existing manufacturing jobs in each of the electoral wards of the North-East Region which were (i) included in and (ii) excluded from the European-aid approved map in recent changes. [120206]

Mr. Caborn: The information on resident unemployment counts has been placed in the Library of the House. Due to commercial confidentiality the majority of the information on manufacturing jobs is not available at individual ward level. Where such information is available, it has been incorporated within the tables on unemployment.

Trading Losses

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the policy of (a) the EU and (b) the United Kingdom Government towards paying grant for trading losses by manufacturing businesses. [120860]

Mr. Byers: Any grants paid by the EU Governments to manufacturing companies must fall within the EU State aid rules, which are detailed in Volume 2a of "Competition Law in the European Community", a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

TRW/Lucas Varity Filtronics

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if the grants to TRW/Lucas Varity Filtronics, mentioned on page 59 of Cm 4611, have been delayed in payment. [121004]

Mr. Byers: There have been no delays in making payment.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Omagh Bombing (Police Investigation)

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many RUC detectives are engaged in the investigation into the deaths of 29 people in Omagh on 15 August 1998. [114716]

Mr. Ingram: The number of officers actively engaged in this investigation has varied at different times to meet the needs of inquiries. All appropriate resources have been made available throughout the investigation. I am advised that there are currently 20 detective officers working full-time on the inquiry team.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the cost to the latest available date of the RUC investigations into the Omagh Bomb. [114894]

Mr. Ingram: This information is not readily available and could be obtained only at a disproportionate cost.

Websites

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what his Department's policy is on (a) advertising and (b) acknowledging company sponsorship on the websites of his Department, agencies and non-departmental public bodies; which companies (i) have placed advertisements and (ii) are acknowledged as sponsors on those websites; how much revenue has been received for each financial year since 1997 from such advertisements and sponsorship; and if that revenue has been retained within the budget of his Department, agencies and non-departmental public bodies. [119555]

Mr. Ingram: The Northern Ireland Civil Service policy on web advertising and sponsorship has not yet been published but will follow the line which has been developed by the Central Information Unit in the Cabinet Office which is as follows:

> Government sites are permitted to carry advertising. In designing pages, departments and agencies should ensure that advertisers' branding does not detract from the effectiveness and appearance of their own branding or that of the government as a whole. Particular attention should be given to avoid any implication of endorsement of products or services or of contradiction between government messages and those of advertisers.

Only two Northern Ireland departmental websites carry the logos of companies. The Roads Service traffic camera site contains the logo of Peregrine Associates; and the Greenmount Agricultural College web page carries logos of the Northern Bank Group, Richardsons Fertilizers, Thompsons and United Dairy Farmers.

No revenue was, or is being, received from the inclusion of these logos.

Harland and Woolf

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on how many occasions Ministers in his Department have met (a) representatives of trade unions at Harland and Woolf shipyard, (b) officials of the Department of Economic Development and (c) lay members representing the trade unions at Harland and Woolf to discuss the future of the shipyard; when the last such meeting was held; and what future meetings are planned. [120497]

Mr. Ingram: Since October 1999 Ministers, including those in the Northern Ireland Executive, have had three main meetings with representatives of trade unions at Harland and Woolf and a series of meetings with Departmental officials to discuss matters in relation to the shipyard.

The most recent Ministerial meeting with trade unions was on 23 March 2000. Ministers receive written briefings from officials on at least a weekly basis and meetings with officials will take place as required. Future meetings with trade unions and officials will take place as necessary.

Investment and Finance Working Group

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on what date the report of the Investment and Finance Cross Sector Working Group was placed on the Strategy 2010 web site; on what dates (a) the summary of that report and (b) the report of the Inward Investment sub-group were removed; and for what reason the latter document was removed. [120587]

Mr. Ingram: The report of the Investment and Finance Working Group, which includes an executive summary, was placed on the website in November 1999.

The Inward Investment report was an interim discussion document produced by the Exports and Marketing Working Group. It was replaced by the Group's final report in November 1999.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Ireland

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the sale price of the Ambassador's residence in Sandycove, Dublin; what was the purchase price of the house in Rathfarnham, Dublin, which is to be used as the Ambassador's residence; and if he will make a statement. [119326]

Mr. Battle [holding answer 20 April 2000]: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my late right hon. Friend, Derek Fatchett, the then Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, on 14 January 1999, Official Report, column 254W, in respect of the Glencairn estate in Dublin. It is not our policy to reveal details of price and other terms agreed in such transactions. I will write to my hon. Friend shortly about this matter.

Entry Clearance (Lima)

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many applications for (a) visitors' visas, (b) student entry clearance and (c) settlement have been made at the British Embassy in Lima in each of the last three years; and what proportion of each has been successful. [120744]

Mr. Vaz: The number of non-settlement visa applications for 1997, 1998 and 1999 were as follows:

Year	Received	Issued	Refused
1997	3,347	3,257	90
1998	3,839	3,680	159
1999	3,581	3,567	189

These figures include the following number of student applications:

Year	Received	Issued	Refused
Student
1997	235	213	22
1998	266	219	47
1999	299	248	48
Settlement
1997	40	39	1
1998	45	43	2
1999	61	59	1

The 1997 and 1998 figures are available in the Library of the House in the publications "Entry Clearance Global Statistics". The 1999 figures will be placed in the Library soon.

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many staff are employed at the British Embassy in Lima to deal with applications for entry clearance. [120743]

Mr. Vaz: The entry clearance section of the British Embassy in Peru is staffed by five officers of whom two are UK-based and three locally engaged. One officer is devoted full-time to entry clearance work; the remainder share entry clearance duties with other responsibilities.

British Overseas Territory Citizenship Bill

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish the British Overseas Territory Citizenship Bill in draft. [120731]

Mr. Battle [holding answer 2 May 2000]: Officials are continuing to work on the principles to be addressed in the Overseas Territories Bill, which will include the grant of British citizenship to British Dependent Territories citizens. We are considering the options for its publication. Our priority is to introduce the Bill into the House as soon as Parliamentary time becomes available.

Iraq

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will meet Hans von Sponeck to discuss the effect of sanctions on Iraq. [120861]

Mr. Hain: No. Our priority is to improve the humanitarian situation by getting the best out of the "oil for food" programme while we work to get Iraq to move towards the suspension and eventual lifting of sanctions. To that end we maintain a close dialogue at all levels with the UN officials presently responsible for running the "oil for food" programme. I myself discussed the humanitarian situation and the "oil for food" programme with the Head of the Office of the Iraq programme (Mr. von Sponeck's former superior), Mr. Benon Sevan, in New York on 25 April. I see no need for a dialogue with Mr. von Sponeck, who has made his views quite clear and who is no longer involved in the practical efforts to improve the humanitarian situation.

Japan

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the visit of the Prime Minister of Japan to Britain on 3 May. [121066]

Mr. Battle: The Japanese Prime Minister visited the United Kingdom as part of a tour of G8 countries. He had useful discussions with my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on priorities for this year's G8 Summit in Okinawa.

Iran

Ms Moran: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will exert pressure on the Iranian Government to respect the human rights of Iranian Jews, Baha'is and Christians. [121193]

Mr. Hain: We and our EU partners have regularly raised with the Iranian authorities our concerns over a number of human rights issues, including treatment of religious minorities in Iran. While concerns remain we will continue to raise these issues.

Peru

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with the Government of Peru regarding the persecution of Christians in that country; and if he will make a statement. [121008]

Mr. Battle: The Peruvian Constitution provides for freedom of religion, and the Government respect this. We have received no reports of religious persecution.

India

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what trade deals he was able to facilitate on his visit to India. [120552]

Mr. Caborn: I have been asked to reply.

During his visit to India in January, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry witnessed the signature of two partnership agreements with Indian companies involving two enterprising British firms, Gemini Dataloggers of Chichester and Antech International of Suffolk. These partnerships were fostered under Enterprise Initiative: India, a new British Trade International trade development scheme offering help and support to UK companies seeking business in key India States. He set a target of the creation of 200 such partnerships. He also supported several UK companies in their pursuit of project business, and set a target for a 20 per cent. increase in bilateral trade.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Calf Processing Aid Scheme

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate the cost of extending the Calf Processing Aid scheme beyond 1 August 1999 to the latest possible date allowed under European Union rules. [120601]

Mr. Nick Brown: The estimated cost of continuing to run the scheme until 31 December 1999 would have been about £24 million.

Food Supplements

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the responses of European Union member states to the consultation exercise undertaken by the European Commission in connection with the forthcoming Directive on Food Supplements; and what assessment he has made of such responses in terms of their (a) consistency with and (b) opposition to United Kingdom policy and practice. [115796]

Ms Stuart: I have been asked to reply.

Member states' responses to the Commission's discussion paper on dietary supplements have not been published. Our view is that consumers should be allowed the greatest possible amount of choice consistent with adequate health protection, but there is limited support for this position from other member states. Most believe that controls on supplements should be based on the premise that the dose supplied should be restricted to a level close to that needed to ensure an adequate intake of nutrients.

The Food Standards Agency has recently circulated a preliminary draft text of the Directive on Food Supplements to interested parties for information. A formal consultation and parliamentary scrutiny will be initiated when a formal proposal has been adopted by the Commission.

Rural Developments Plan

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if the explanatory booklet, pursuant to his Oral statement of 7 December 1999, Official Report, column 706, concerning the England Rural Development Plan has been published. [120639]

Mr. Nick Brown: Yes.

Council Tax (Uninhabitable Properties)

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made of the cost to farmers of the decision that uninhabitable properties will be liable for council tax. [120576]

Mr. Nick Brown: My Department is not in a position to estimate the cost to farmers of the decision to place a 12 month limit on the exemption from council tax where unoccupied dwellings need major repair works to render them habitable or are undergoing structural alteration. Local authorities are responsible for administering the council tax and only they could identify the owners of such homes in their areas.

Landbased Sector

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the level of funding provided by the Government for the National Training Organisation for the Landbased Sector in each of the last three years, the current year and each of the next three years. [120568]

Mr. Nick Brown: MAFF Funding for Lantra, the National Training Organisation for the landbased sector is as follows:

Funding £000

Type of funding	1997–98	1998–99	1999–2000	2000–01	2001–02	2002–03	2003–04

Total Aid	1,508	1,339	797	2,328	300	300	0

[1] The current MAFF contract runs until 31 March 2003. No decisions have been taken on an extension beyond that date.
[2] Includes £600,000 from the support announced for hill farmers.

Lantra also receives funding from other Government Departments including the Department for Education and Employment, and from the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority, the devolved administrations and the European Commission.

Krebs Trials

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if the delay in the implementation of the Krebs trials has resulted in a reduction in projected Government expenditure on the trials. [120602]

Mr. Nick Brown: No. The expenditure will be incurred over a longer period.

Dairy Sector

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if the agrimonetary compensation in the dairy sector will be paid to the lessee where quota is leased. [120600]

Mr. Nick Brown: Yes.

Waste Directives

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made of the cost to British farmers of implementing (a) the Nitrates Directive and (b) the Waste Framework Directive. [120561]

Mr. Nick Brown: The Regulatory Appraisal, published when the Action Programme for Nitrate Vulnerable Zones (England and Wales) Regulations 1998 were laid before Parliament, gave an estimated total annual cost of £4.4 million and an estimated total capital cost of £7.5 million for implementing the Action Programme measures in the existing 68 zones in England and Wales.

The Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions has lead responsibility for the Waste Framework Directive.

Agricultural Development Scheme

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the level of funding from the Government Agricultural Development Scheme and its successor schemes in each of the last three years, the current year and in each of the next three years. [120564]

Mr. Nick Brown: MAFF Funding for Lantra, the National Training Organisation for the landbased sector is as follows:

Funding £000

	Type of funding
Year	MAFF contract	Sector challenge	Agriculture development scheme[1]	Action plan for farming package	Total aid
1997–98	1,021	487	0	0	1,508
1998–99	455	884	0	0	1,339
1999–2000	356	441	0	0	797
2000–01	300	128	100	1,800[2]	2,328
2001–02	300	0	0	0	300
2002–03	300	0	0	0	300

[1] (Benchmarking)
[2] Includes £600,000 from the support announced for hill farmers.
[3] The current MAFF contract runs until 31 March 2003. No decisions have bene taken on an extension beyond that date.

Lantra also receives funding from other Government Departments including the Department for Education and Employment, and from the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority, the devolved administrations and the European Commission.

BSE

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the level of UK Government expenditure on BSE eradication measures in each of the last three years, the current year and the next three years. [120570]

Mr. Nick Brown: The main measure in place in the UK to eradicate BSE is the ban on the feeding of mammalian meat and bone meal to farmed ruminants. This is enforced by a survey of feed mills and other premises which hold animal feed, and testing of the samples for the presence of mammalian protein. The cost of the tests carried out since the survey began in August 1996 amounts to some £4 million. The cost of the collection and submission of the samples to the laboratory could not be obtained except at disproportionate cost.

The cost of compensation for the slaughter of BSE suspects, and the transport and disposal of their carcases and other associated costs are shown in the table.

	BSE Compensation	Transport and disposal and other costs
1997–98	3,084,159	1,427,787
1998–99	1,964,095	1,461,743
1999–2000[1]	1,264,153	[2]1,850,000

[1] Estimate
[2] This item incudes some expenditure on scrapie which cannot be separated from BSE expenditure.

The cost of compensation and disposal in the current and future years will depend on market prices and the numbers of BSE suspects reported.

Mrs. Fiona Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received expressing concern about the way in which the cull of BSE-offspring cattle is being conducted. [119754]

Ms Quin: During the operation of the cull, 8,241 offspring have been slaughtered with a further 178 awaiting slaughter. We have received 120 letters on the cull. The majority of these have expressed concern over the level of compensation offered, while a small number have queried the basis of the cull.

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his policy on making available material from beef carcases for the purpose of research into BSE. [120700]

Ms Quin: The Veterinary Laboratories Agency (VLA) holds an archive of material from BSE-infected cattle. Scientists may apply directly to the TSE Office at VLA to request samples of these tissues for use in research. Applications are approved by the TSE Research and Surveillance Unit in MAFF on the basis of the supplies available and the merit of the research. Scientists also need to show that they have the containment facilities available to perform the research and any necessary Home Office or import licences. Where sufficient supplies exist, reasonable requests will be granted and the tissues will be released once funding for the research is secured.

Farm Waste Grant Scheme

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proportion of the budget allocated to the Farm Waste Grant Scheme was taken up in each year of its operation; and what his policy is on the use of underspend. [120571]

Mr. Nick Brown: Since the Farm Waste Grant Scheme came into operation in April 1996, the proportion of the budget taken up each year has been:

	Percentage
1996–97	2
1997–98	13
1998–99	17
1999–2000	8

Surplus funds are reallocated to other areas of expenditure in the Department according to priorities.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the level of funding for the Farm Waste Grant Scheme in each of the last three years, the current year and each of the next three years. [120562]

Mr. Nick Brown: The level of funding available for the Farm Waste Grant Scheme in each of the years concerned is as follows:

	£ million
1997–98	0.8
1998–99	0.8
1999–2000	0.8
2000–01	0.8
2001–02	4.5
2002–03	4.5
2003–04	4.5

Regional Development Agencies

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what the level of regional development agencies' spending on agricultural programmes is in (a) the current financial year and (b) the next financial year. [120574]

Mr. Nick Brown: Nil.

Stress (Rural Areas)

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what the level of Government funding for voluntary bodies dealing with stress among people living in rural areas was in each of the last three years and in the current year; and what plans he has to increase this level of support in the next year. [120578]

Mr. Nick Brown: The Department of Health has provided funding totalling £90,000 for the Rural Stress Information Network (RSIN) and a further £118,860 for a 'Rural Minds' project between 1997–98 and this year. An official from my Department has been seconded to the RSIN for the last two years.

We will extend the RSIN secondment for at least a further year. In addition, we will provide £0.5 million this year to support organisations which help alleviate rural stress.

European Centre for Organic Fruit and Nursery Stock

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) how much funding for the European Centre for Organic Fruit and Nursery Stock is paid for out of his Department's research and development budget; [120581]

(2) if he will make a statement on the role of the European Centre for Organic Fruit and Nursery Stock; [120579]

(3) if he will publish the budget for the European Centre for Organic Fruit and Nursery Stock for each of the next three years. [120580]

Mr. Nick Brown: I announced the creation of the Centre on 30 March this year following a successful bid by Horticulture Research International to the Capital Modernisation Fund.

The European Centre for Organic Fruit and Nursery Stock to be set up by HRI will be a unique centre of excellence whose primary aim will be the development of a deeper scientific basis for organics and to disseminate that knowledge effectively across the organic sector, from growers through to consumers. The Centre will offer a wide range of economic, educational, environmental and efficiency benefits and will contribute further to the Government's support for the horticulture sector.

The CMF grant totals £2.261 million for 2000–01 and 2001–02. It is being provided from central funds. HRI will be establishing budgets in due course.

R&D Budget

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish the budget for his Department's research and development in each of (a) the last three and (b) the next three years. [120582]

Mr. Nick Brown: The R&D budgets for 1997–98, 1998–99 and 1999–2000 were £140.5 million, £139.8 million and £139.3 million respectively. Our planned spend in 2000–01 and 2001–02 is £118 million and £120.9 million, reflecting the transfer of some £21 million to the Food Standards Agency, on 1 April 2000, to cover R&D on food science matters now within their responsibilities. These figures include a proportion of the Department's grant aid to Kew, research initiated by the Department's Economics Division, and the costs of administering the research budget. The budget for 2002–03 is subject to the Government's current spending review.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much funding for knowledge transfer is provided from his Department's research budgets in each of the last three years; and how much will be provided in the current year and each of the next three years. [120569]

Mr. Nick Brown: There are no separate budgets. However, knowledge transfer is an integral part of the role played by R&D carried out by MAFF both to inform and underpin policy-making and the Department's regulatory responsibilities; and to assist the farming, food and fisheries industries in accordance with MAFF's aim and objectives.

IPPC Charges

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the cost of the proposed level of IPPC charges to farmers in (a) the United Kingdom and (b) each of the other member states of the European Union. [120583]

Mr. Nick Brown: As part of the Government's Action Plan for Farming it was confirmed that, subject to agreement with the industry on a system of general binding rules, the Environment Agency's interim and longer-term charge for an IPPC permit in England and Wales should be less than half the £12,000-£18,000 originally proposed. IPPC charges in Scotland are devolved and are therefore a matter for Scottish Ministers. Arrangements for Northern Ireland are still being considered. Our inquiries indicate that many other member states will be passing on costs for IPPC to intensive livestock installations, although some have yet to decide how to implement IPPC and what charges will be made. The Environment Agency is currently undertaking a fuller study of the position which will inform the development of a longer-term charging scheme in England and Wales.

Hill Farm Support Payments

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made of the cost to hill farmers of complying with the new conditions being attached to hill farm support payments. [120558]

Mr. Nick Brown: The only new condition we propose attaching to less favoured area support payments is compliance with certain standards of Good Farming Practice. Responsible farmers should not incur any additional costs.

Diversification

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much the free consultancy service to be made available to farmers seeking approval from the planning authorities for a diversification project under the England Rural Development Plan will cost; and how it will be funded. [120560]

Mr. Nick Brown: The details of this service are still being developed together with those of the Rural Enterprise Scheme.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how planning advice for existing diversification schemes is (a) provided to farmers and (b) funded. [120572]

Mr. Nick Brown: There are no farm diversification schemes currently open to applicants.

Pig Farmers

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what financial aid the Government have provided for pig farmers in each of the last three years. [120599]

Mr. Nick Brown: The CAP pigmeat regime contains no provision for paying subsidies direct to pig farmers. However, in addition to the restructuring scheme announced as part of the Action Plan for Farming, the Government have helped and are continuing to help the pig industry in many ways. For example:

Pig industry projects benefited significantly from the Agriculture Development Scheme 1999, being awarded over 35 per cent. of the total grants made.

£3 million of marketing/promotional money was earmarked exclusively for the pig sector. Discussions with the industry have resulted in the Government agreeing to part fund a £4.6 million industry led welfare linked promotion campaign.

The interpretation of the Food Labelling Regulations 1996 in respect of origin marking has been tightened up. New guidelines have been issued to Trading Standard Authorities and to the industry.

A "verification officer" has been appointed; part of whose remit is to work with industry bodies to identify cases where product is being sold at retail or catering level which misleads the consumer into believing it contains pork of British origin when in fact it is imported. The verification officer's role also includes checking progress on the commitment given some time ago by major retailers that all their own label fresh pork and certain processed products such as bacon would come from stall and tether and MBM free production systems.

The date for implementing IPPC for established pig farms has been put back to 2007.

Hill Livestock Compensation Allowance

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans the Government have to reduce funding for hill livestock compensation allowance payments and its successor schemes after 2000–01. [120557]

Mr. Nick Brown: The funding for the new Hill Farm Allowance Scheme will be determined in the context of the current Spending Review.

GM Crops

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will place a copy of the specification for the BRIGHT research project, carried out by NIAB and funded by his Department, together with any interim results in the Library. [120718]

Ms Quin: BRIGHT is a LINK project in the MAFF-sponsored Sustainable Arable Production through Precision Input Optimisation (SAPPIO) Programme. It is being conducted by a consortium of industry and academic partners grant aided by UK Government Departments. This consortium is responsible for publicity and has publicised the scientific approaches, objectives and progress of the research. The publicity programme includes articles in the MAFF-produced Agri-LINK Newsletter. The research is being conducted by the Institute for Arable Crops Research, the National Institute for Agricultural Botany, and the Scottish Agricultural College.

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what research has been undertaken by the Pesticides Safety Directorate into the impact of herbicides on genetically modified herbicide tolerant crops; and if he will publish the results. [120344]

Ms Quin: The Pesticides Safety Directorate (PSD) co-ordinates a research programme which supports the risk assessments carried out during the approval process and investigates ways of minimising pesticide use. This includes work on human health and environmental consequences of herbicide use.

The Government also support a number of projects on GMHT crops. In particular, the BRIGHT project, part funded by industry, includes work on the impact of herbicides on GMHT crops. This project started in April 1999 and is due to last for four years. The results will be published.

Companies have to provide detailed scientific safety data before the Government will consider approving the use of a given herbicide on a given GMHT crop.

Fishing (European Structural Funds)

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in what ways the fishing industry can be assisted by means of Objective 2 grants with (a) land-based infrastructure, improvement and renovation schemes, (b) vessel equipment, (c) fish processing and marketing and (d) other support. [119429]

Mr. Morley: Objective 2 plans, which include funding under the European Regional Development Fund (ERDF), have yet to be finalised and agreed with the European Commission. ERDF funding could cover fishing port infrastructure.

Funding under the Financial Instrument for Fisheries Guidance (FIFG) would be available across the country and is not dependent on Objective 2 status. Plans for FIFG funding have yet to be finalised and agreed with the European Commission. Under the FIFG regulation, this could cover projects under (a), (b) and (c).

Other support, such as funding for training fishermen, could be available from the European Social Fund, both within and outside Objective 2 areas.

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what (a) rules and (b) guidance he has set for fishing industry grant applicants for Objective 1 funds. [119342]

Mr. Morley: The European Commission has yet to agree the Single Programming Document for the Cornwall and Scilly Isles Objective 1 area, including the proposed priorities and measures funded through the Financial Instrument for Fisheries Guidance. Rules and guidance for applicants will be finalised following Commission approval and consistent with the relevant European regulations.

Irish Sea Cod Recovery Programme

Dr. Godman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which United Kingdom fisherman's associations and other bodies are involved in the Irish Sea Cod Recovery Programme; which other maritime states are represented; and if he will make a statement. [118692]

Mr. Morley: The Fisheries Departments in the UK have been in close consultation with the UK fishing industry and other interests both directly and through the Irish Sea Panel of the Fisheries Conservation Group about the development of the Irish Sea Cod Recovery Programme. The organisations consulted include:

National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations
Scottish Fishermen's Federation
Anglo-North Irish Fish Producers' Organisation
Northern Ireland Fish Producers' Organisation
United Kingdom Association of Fish Producers' Organisations
Fleetwood Fish Producers' Organisation
Fleetwood Fish Forum
Associated British Ports
Sea Fish Industry Authority
Association of Sea Fisheries Committees
Cumbria Sea Fisheries Committee
North Western and North Wales Sea Fisheries Committee
Department of Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry of the Isle of Man
Fleetwood and Barrow in Furness Inshore Fishermen.

Representatives of the UK fishing industry, together with officials and scientists from the Fisheries Departments have attended two regional consultative meetings with the Commission in Brussels. The other countries which have cod quota in the Irish Sea—Belgium, France, the Netherlands and the Republic of Ireland—have also been involved in the development of the Recovery Plan.

I welcome this close involvement of fishermen in the preparation of regional measures for stock conservation and recovery.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what compensation he proposes to offer to British and Irish beamers to stop fishing in the Irish Sea. [119237]

Mr. Morley: None. UK beamers volunteered to stay out of the area of the Irish Sea which was closed to protect spawning cod. I am grateful to them for the responsible lead they took in furthering an important conservation objective and to the Irish Government, with whom we co-operate closely on many fisheries issues of common interest, for agreeing to keep their beam trawlers out of the closed area between 13 March and 1 May.

Climate Change Levy

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the impact of the climate change levy on the fish-processing sector; what compliance costs the sector will face; what assistance will be offered to this sector; and what derogations are (a) in place and (b) under negotiation. [120245]

Ms Quin: The impact of the climate change levy on a sector or an individual firm will depend upon future energy use, employment trends and take up of the incentives to improve energy efficiency.

Compliance costs relating to the administration of the scheme will fall mainly on the energy suppliers. More information is contained in the Regulatory Impact Assessment prepared by Customs and Excise.

As the fish processing industry falls within the scope of the Integrated Pollution Prevention Control Directive, it can participate in the energy agreement to receive an 80 per cent. levy discount if agreed energy efficiency targets are met, which is being negotiated with the Food and Drink Federation.

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the impact of the climate change levy on each sector of the agriculture industry. [120278]

Ms Quin: The Government have sought to design the climate change levy in a way that maximises its environmental effectiveness while taking account of the competitiveness of UK firms. The impact of the climate change levy on individual sectors of the agricultural industry will depend, among other things, on each sector's future energy use, employment trends and take-up of the various incentives offered under the levy to improve energy efficiency. Further, reductions in the rate of levy are available to the energy-intensive sectors of pigs and poultry in return for reaching agreed energy targets and, subject to approval under state aid rules, a 50 per cent. reduction to horticulture.

Veterinary Inspectors

Mr. Prosser: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he is taking to monitor whether local veterinary inspectors in other EU member states who inspect live farm animals prior to export are adhering to the revised procedures for sheep and pigs destined for fattening, production and slaughter which came into effect on 31 May 1999. [119132]

Mr. Morley: The procedures which the Government introduced on 31 May were a national measure to ensure that the inspections of these animals prior to their export are carried out to the highest possible standards. They were not introduced in other EU member states, who set their own standards.

Regulation of Investigatory Powers Bill

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on his policy in respect of the use his Department, its agencies and public bodies will make of the powers relating to the authorised obtaining of communications data in Part I, Chapter II of the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Bill once the Bill is enacted. [119516]

Mr. Morley: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary on 19 April 2000, Official Report, column 509W.

Regional Service Centres

Mr. Luff: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if, following the publication of his Department's annual report, with particular reference to paragraph 1.7, he will reject the findings of the recent study that recommended the closure of Regional Service Centres. [119763]

Mr. Morley: My right hon. Friend is still considering the future of the Regional Service Centres following the recent review of CAP scheme administration, and in light of the recent reports from the Performance and Innovation Unit which recommend closer alignment of MAFF's regional policy activities, including its regional representational role and information activity, with the Government Offices for the Regions. The further development and strengthening of MAFF's working partnership with the GOs, the Regional Development Agencies and other regional players, and the taking forward of plans for integrating MAFF's regional rural development activity with the GO structure, are identified in the Departmental Report as key challenges for 2000–01.

Modulation (Devolved Assemblies)

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how decisions made in the National Assembly for Wales, Northern Ireland Assembly and the Scottish Parliament affect his policy on modulation. [118578]

Ms Quin: Under the terms of EU Council Regulation 1259/99, modulation has to be applied consistently throughout a member state. It is therefore incumbent upon all parts of the United Kingdom to agree an approach to this, and that is what we are doing.

With Government's commitment fully to match-fund farmers' contributions up to the levels set out in the England Rural Development Plan, modulation provides the means for securing substantial extra resources for Rural Development.

Minimum Wage

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate the annual cost to his Department, in terms of salary payments, which would result from an increase of the minimum wage for all age groups to (a) £4, (b) £4.20 and (c) £4.50 per hour. [120246]

Mr. Morley: Staff in my Department and its Agencies are salaried and are not paid by the hour. However, for the purposes of this question I am able to calculate salary levels based on normal full-time working hours of 36 per week in London or 37 hours elsewhere.

No staff in my Department are paid at salary levels less than or equivalent to £4.00 or £4.20 per hour. If the minimum wage for all staff was increased to a salary level equivalent to £4.50 per hour the annual cost to my Department would be £51,464.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Child Support Agency

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many CSA inspectors are in post and operating in the Lancashire and Merseyside region. [120863]

Mr. Rooker: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the Chief Executive, Mrs. Faith Boardman. She will write to my right hon. Friend.

Letter from Mrs. Faith Boardman to Mr. Frank Field, dated 5 May 2000:

I am replying to your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about the Child Support Agency.

At present, three members of Agency staff in the Lancashire and Merseyside regions carry out inspectoral duties, which include investigating the earnings of the self-employed and company directors and conducting interviews under caution. However the Wales and North West Business Unit plan to train an additional 25 officers to undertake inspectoral visits, of whom seven will operate in the Lancashire and Merseyside regions.

Under current legislation child support inspectors are appointed on a case by case basis which means that they must be given a time-limited certificate of appointment for each individual case. As a result, CSA Inspectors have not, to date, been used to their best effect. This rigid and cumbersome method of appointment has prevented the Agency from building up a team of dedicated and experienced inspectors.

However, the Agency has increased the number of locally based face to face officers to 600, a process that was completed at the end of March this year. The Agency is currently considering whether some, or all, of the face to face officers should also perform the role of child support inspectors or whether separate dedicated teams of inspectors would be more effective. Under the child support reforms it is planned to appoint permanent inspectors.

I hope this is helpful.

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 19 April 2000, Official Report, column 551W, if he will list the IT procurement contracts agreed with EDS since 1 May 1997 with a value over £10,000; when each contract was agreed; when the IT provision began to be installed; and if each IT system is (a) fully operational and (b) in use. [120922]

Mr. Rooker: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the Chief Executive, Mrs. Faith Boardman. She will write to my right hon. Friend.

Letter from Mrs. Faith Boardman to Mr. Frank Field, dated 5 May 2000:

I am replying to your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about the Child Support Agency.

No specific IT Procurement contracts have been awarded to EDS since 1/5/97. However, the Department's private sector partner Affinity (prime contractor EDS) was awarded an early contract in March 1999, to provide products key to the future development of modernised IT for the Department.

In addition, to maintain progress against legislative timescales for Child Support Reforms, an interim contract for early IT pre-development and preparation work was let to Affinity 23/12/99, to deliver products which pave the way for new IT for the CSA. In both cases, neither the contracts nor their products were intended to deliver an operational IT system.

The Department does not hold an existing contract with EDS, awarded in 1995, for the provision of some mainframe-based IT and associated services.

A number of consultancy contracts are also held with EDS to help determine the Department's business and financial requirements relevant to the delivery of the full IT systems, under the main contracts.

The award of all contracts has been subject to the Department's formal procurement controls to ensure fair and open competition.

I hope this is helpful.

Occupational Pensions

Mr. Portillo: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what has been the percentage change in the value of UK pension funds since May 1997. [120993]

Mr. Rooker: Information is not available from May 1997 as data is collected on an annual basis. The percentage increase in the value of UK pension funds between December 1996 and December 1997 (the most recent figure available), above is 17 per cent.

Note:

The amount of money set aside to meet pensions liabilities is a proxy for the amount of money held in pensions.

Source:

ONS estimates based partly on "DTI returns".

Mr. Portillo: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many new occupational pension schemes were set up in (a) 1979 to 1996, (b) 1997, (c) 1998 and (d) 1999. [121018]

Mr. Rooker: The information is in the table.

Number of new occupational pension schemes which registered with the Pension Schemes Registry

Period	Number
1979 to 1996	159,054
1997	6,133
1998	4,939
1999	3,170

Note:

Pension schemes have to register with the Pension Schemes Registry when they have two or more members and have applied for, or received, tax approval from the Inland Revenue

Winter Fuel Payments

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the total costs for (a) each of the past two years, (b) the current year and (c) projected for each of the next two years, broken down into administrative and non-administrative costs and including the cost of the telephone helplines. [121043]

Mr. Rooker: The information is in the table.

Administration and non-administration cost for the winter fuel payment scheme

Year	Non-administration costs	Administration costs
1997–98	200 million	13.7 million
1998–99	200 million	13.1 million
1999–2000	760 million	14.3 million
2000–01	1.4 billion[1]	Not yet available[2]
2001–02	1.2 billion[1]	Not yet available[2]

[1] Includes the cost of making backdated payments as a result of changes to the eligibility rules.
[2] Projected figures are not available for these years as the process details are not yet finalised.

Minimum Income Guarantee

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 19 April 2000, Official Report, column 551W, how many pensioners are excluded from the minimum income guarantee because of income from an occupational pension. [120921]

Mr. Rooker: An estimated 1,120,000 cases would qualify for the minimum income guarantee if their occupational pension were completely disregarded.

Fraud

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if the Government have fulfilled their commitment in paragraph 3.18 of the White Paper, "Safeguarding Social Security", to ensure that data are correct on 1.8 million payroll items; how many anomalies (a) were found, (b) were passed to fraud investigators, (c) resulted in prosecution and (d) resulted in conviction; and of the anomalies, how many arose from cases where people were simultaneously working and claiming. [120859]

Mr. Rooker: During 1999–2000, 626,641 payroll records were checked. 288,924 anomalies were found, of which 251,201 were name and address changes. 6,223 cases were referred to fraud for investigation because of possible fraud. Of these, 5,943 involved suspicions that people might be claiming benefit without declaring their earnings. As of 31 March 2000, fraud has been proved in 683 of these cases and there have been 114 prosecutions leading to a conviction. We do not know how many prosecutions were unsuccessful in this area.

The National Insurance Contributions Office has a target to check 3 million payroll records in 2000–01.

Postgraduate Maintenance

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what arrangements exist to provide income maintenance for persons who are forced to suspend a course of postgraduate education because of illness. [118911]

Mr. Wicks: I have been asked to reply.

Responsibility for postgraduate awards is shared with the Arts and Humanities Research Board or one of the six Research Councils, depending on the field of study. Each Research Council is an independent body, free, within the terms of its Charter and the resources available to it, to make its own decisions about expenditure on postgraduate support.

Support for postgraduate teacher training is generally provided by my Department under the Student Support Regulations. Maintenance support is in the form of a student loan. Support is payable for absence from a course due to illness for up to 60 days, and for longer periods at the discretion of the relevant local education authority, which will take into account financial hardship.

The Department provides support to 50 postgraduate students at three European Institutions, the Bologna Center, the College of Europe and the European University Institute and provides continuing support for the first 60 days of illness. Thereafter each case is considered by my Department on its own merits.

In relation to Research Council students, where a student becomes sick during their studies, arrangements vary depending on the awarding body and the nature of the course. The Economic and Social Research Council, for example, allows a student's grant to continue unaffected for the first eight weeks of sickness. The Medical Research Council continue to pay the grant at the full rate for the first 21 days of sickness and at half rate for the next 28 days and would then suspend payment.

Separate, broadly similar arrangements apply in Northern Ireland. In Scotland, the system of support for postgraduates largely follows that for undergraduates and, in the main, continues to be paid during periods of illness.

Additional assistance for postgraduate students studying in the UK who are absent from their course due to illness may be available through the Access Funds. These allow universities and colleges to provide extra discretionary support for students in particular need; and a total of £76.4 million has been made available in England for the 1999–2000 academic year.

Full-time students who interrupt their studies because of illness and have been incapable of work for 28 weeks may be eligible for income support. Details of benefits are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Congo (Zimbabwean Forces)

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received of the deployment of Zimbabwean forces in protecting mining interests in the Congo; and who owns those interests. [120868]

Mr. Hain: We have seen reports that the Zimbabwean Defence Forces are deployed in areas of the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC) which contain the main diamond fields and reserves of copper and cobalt. We understand that exploitation of diamonds is principally carried out by the Societe Miniere de Bakwanga (MIBA), and production of copper and cobalt by GECAMINES. Both of these companies are substantially DRC state-owned, but there are reports that they have entered into joint venture with various partners. There are also reports that the Zimbabwean Defence Force has set up a company called OSLEG Private Limited, which includes capital provided by private investors, to exploit DRC's mineral reserves.

Zimbabwe

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his oral statement of 3 May 2000, Official Report, columns 149–50, if he will list the dates of his meetings with the previous Secretary-General of the Commonwealth to discuss the crisis in Zimbabwe. [121202]

Mr. Hain: Neither my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary nor I spoke to the previous Commonwealth Secretary General following the onset of the recent wave of illegal farm occupations in Zimbabwe.

Iran

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what communication he has had with the Iranian Foreign Minister regarding the timing of his visit to Iran; and if he raised the issue of legal proceedings concerning members of the Jewish community in Shiraz in the course of that communication. [121213]

Mr. Hain: The Iranian authorities are well aware of our concerns about the trial of 13 members of the Jewish community on espionage charges in Shiraz. The Foreign Secretary made these clear to Dr. Kharrazi personally when he visited London in January. We and our EU partners have raised our concerns on many occasions, most recently in the form of a demarche by the EU Presidency in Tehran on 29 April. As the hon. Gentleman will be aware, the Foreign Secretary's visit to Tehran has been postponed from 8/9 May to 4/5 July. The Foreign Secretary spoke briefly to Iranian Foreign Minister Kharrazi on 29 April in order to postpone this visit.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 17 April 2000, Official Report, columns 396–97W, what assessment he has made of recent developments in the legal proceedings concerning members of the Jewish community in Shiraz, Iran, with particular reference to the case of Hamid Tefilin; what representations have been made to the Government of Iran about the decision to hold the trial in camera and about the proceedings in general; what steps have been taken by the Government to monitor the trial; and if he will make a statement. [121141]

Mr. Hain: We and our EU partners have raised our concerns about the detention and trial of a number of Iranians including 13 members of the Iranian Jewish community in Shiraz on espionage charges with the Iranian authorities on a number of occasions, most recently in the form of a demarche by the EU Presidency in Tehran on 29 April.

Our Embassy in Tehran is working closely with our EU partners and other like-minded embassies to ensure that events in Shiraz are monitored closely. We are aware of reports emanating from Hamid Tefilin's defence counsel that Mr. Tefilin has confessed to being trained to spy for Israel, but that he has not carried out any espionage activity. We shall continue to monitor events closely.

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Iranian authorities over the banning of newspapers and magazines. [121136]

Mr. Hain: We and our EU partners have been following closely events in Iran. We note that the editors of the newspapers and magazines that have been banned are avoiding public comment and urging their supporters to follow suit in an effort to maintain calm.

Sanctions (Serbia and Iraq)

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make representations at the UN to allow sanctions against (a) Serbia and (b) Iraq to be lifted on goods relating to bona fide scientific and technological work essential to food testing and civil manufacturing industry. [121079]

Mr. Hain: UN Security Council resolution 1160 (1998) imposed an embargo on the supply of arms and related material to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and a ban on arming and training for terrorist activities there. There are no other UN sanctions measures in force in relation to Serbia.

Under the current terms of the "Oil-for-Food" programme, established by Security Council resolution 986, Iraq can sell unlimited quantities of oil to buy a wide range of humanitarian goods, including the kind of equipment mentioned in the question. Iraq is expected to raise $10 billion this year from oil sales. Each contract is checked to ensure that the goods will be used for their stated purpose.

EU Enlargement

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to "IGC: Reform for Enlargement, Cm 4595", what study has been made by (a) Her Majesty's Government and (b) the European Union of the political consequences of admission to the European Union of parts of former Yugoslavia; by whom it was made; and if its conclusions have been published. [121061]

Mr. Vaz: The Government's (and European Union's) overall objective is the fullest possible integration of the countries of the Western Balkans into the political and economic mainstream of Europe. No formal study has been made of the political consequences of admission to the European Union of parts of the former Yugoslavia.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to "IGC: Reform for Enlargement, Cm 4595", in relation to the adoption of the Acquis of the Community, what permanent or temporary derogations are planned to be made to any applicant state in respect of (a) the Common Fisheries Policy, (b) the Common Agricultural Policy and (c) participation in the Cohesion Fund. [121077]

Mr. Vaz: It is too early in the accession negotiations to predict the extent of any derogations.

Negotiations on Fisheries have started with six applicant countries (Cyprus, Czech Republic, Estonia, Hungary, Poland and Slovenia). The EU Common Positions agreed for these negotiations make clear that all new member states will be expected to apply the Common Fisheries Policy in full.

Negotiations have also started on Regional Policy with these countries. But their participation in the Cohesion Funds will not be determined until later in the negotiations.

We expect negotiations on Agriculture with these countries to begin in June this year.

Iraqi Oil Sanction Breaches

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 2 May 2000, Official Report, column 67W, on Iraqi oil, if he has asked the (a) Council of Ministers and (b) European Commission to put pressure on Turkey to bring the trade in Iraqi oil across its borders into the UN humanitarian programme; what was the volume of oil in metric tonnes sold through the UN programme in (i) 1999 and (ii) 2000 to date; and what was the estimated value in (1) 1999 and (2) 2000 to date of Iraqi oil sold (x) through the UN programme and (y) in breach of sanctions. [121054]

Mr. Hain: We have discussed measures to cut down on oil smuggling including through Turkey with the other members of the Security Council which includes two fellow members of the European Union.

The estimated value of illegal oil exports in 1999 was $250 million and in 2000 to date $170 million. As I pointed out in my answer of 2 May, the UK is making every effort to reduce this illegal trade,.

UN statistics for the volume of oil sold under the "oil for food" arrangements are provided for each six month phase and in barrels. For phase V (26 November 1998 to 25 May 1999) the volume of oil sold was 360.8 million barrels worth $3.95 billion. For phase VI (25 May 1999 to 11 December 1999) the volume of oil sold was 389.6 million barrels worth $7.4 billion. Under the present phase (phase VII) the volume of oil sold up to 28 April was 244.7 million barrels worth $5.79 billion. Phase VII ends on 7 June.

TREASURY

Climate Change Levy

Mr. Portillo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what will be the net financial impact, in the first financial year of its operation, of the climate change levy on (a) the automotive industry, (b) the farming industry, (c) the shipbuilding industry and (d) manufacturing industry in the West Midlands. [120992]

Mr. Timms [holding answer 5 May 2000]: The Climate Change Levy package as a whole is expected to be revenue neutral for the private sector. Its introduction will entail no net financial gain for the public finances. The levy package as a whole is also expected to be broadly neutral between the manufacturing and the service sectors.

The Government have sought to design the climate change levy in a way that maximises its environmental effectiveness while protecting the competitiveness of UK firms. It is not possible to say with precision what the effects of the climate change levy on individual sectors or firms will be, since this will depend, among other things, on each sector's future energy use, employment trends, and take up of the various incentives to improve energy efficiency.

New Deal

Mr. Portillo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much has been spent on the New Deal since 1997. [120997]

Mr. Andrew Smith [holding answer 5 May 2000]: Information on the estimated allocation of the Windfall Tax receipts between different programmes, including the New Deal, is set out in Table 4.1 of the Financial Statement and Budget Report, 2000.

Annex Bii of the Department for Education and Employment and the Office for Standards in Education Departmental Report 2000 provides information on expenditure on New Deal programmes within their Departmental Spending Limit.

Figure 10a of the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions Departmental Report 2000 provides information on expenditure on the New Deal for Communities within their Departmental Expenditure Limit.

National Savings Bonds

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent assessment he has made of the efficiency of the administration relating to bonds by National Savings; and if he will make a statement. [120218]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 2 May 2000]: National Savings (NS) takes great care to ensure the systems it uses to deliver its products are efficient and effective. This is essential if NS are to continue to operate successfully in the increasingly competitive retail savings sector. Ministers set annual targets for NS to measure, report on and improve the efficiency of its product administration systems. To achieve these targets NS uses a framework of performance measures, standards and reporting procedures constantly to monitor the efficiency and effectiveness of its product administration systems, including those relating to bonds. This ensures they are subject to continuous improvement and that they remain competitive.

Family Statistics

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the median duration of (a) a marriage and (b) a cohabiting union in (i) 1970, (ii) 1980 and (iii) 1999. [120677]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Alan Goldsmith to Mr. Gerald Howarth, dated 8 May 2000:

The Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS) has been asked to reply to your recent Question on the median duration of (a) a marriage and (b) a cohabiting union in (i) 1970, (ii) 1980 and (iii) 1999. I am replying in the Director's absence.

The only available estimates for marriages ending in divorce or death are as follows:

Estimated[1] median duration of marriages solemnised in England and Wales in:

	Years
1979–80	37

Censuses

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how many people were prosecuted for failure to complete the 1991 census; [121056]

(2) when the 2001 census will be (a) dispatched and (b) due for return. [121055]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Alan Goldsmith to Mr. Nick Gibb, dated 8 May 2000:

The Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS) has been asked to reply to your recent questions on the number of people prosecuted for failure to complete a 1991 Census return and when the 2001 Census form will be despatched and due for return. I am replying in the Director's absence.

The total number of people in England and Wales who were prosecuted for failure to complete a 1991 Census return was 354.

Enumerators will deliver 2001 Census forms of return, and reply-paid envelopes as necessary in advance of census day, which is 29 April 2001. The Census forms should be returned on the day after census day or as soon as possible thereafter. Follow-up enquiries will be undertaken if a form has not been received by 8 May 2001.

The Census Regulations, which provide for the detailed arrangements for the conduct of the census, are shortly to be laid before Parliament.

Holocaust Victims (Compensation)

Mrs. Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what will be the tax treatment of moneys paid out by UK banks under the British Bankers Association Restore UK initiative in respect of bank accounts opened by Holocaust victims, frozen during World War II under the Trading With the Enemy Act and subsequently held as dormant accounts. [121457]

Dawn Primarolo: The Government very much support the British Bankers Association "Restore UK" initiative.

It is right that people who were Holocaust victims, or their beneficiaries, who have moneys restored to them under this scheme, should receive not only the original capital but some form of compensation.

I am glad to announce that no tax will be payable on any moneys paid out by the banks under this initiative to Holocaust victims or their beneficiaries. This exemption will cover income tax liability on any compensation payments as well as any death duties in respect of the capital held in the accounts.

DEFENCE

Army Criminal Legal Aid Authority

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on delays in the payment of bills due under the Army Criminal Legal Aid Authority. [120136]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 2 May 2000]: The Army Criminal Legal Aid Authority (ACLAA) was set up in 1996 to administer the provision of legal aid for individuals facing court-martial or other defined legal processes. The role of ACLAA is to receive applications for legal aid, define the individual contribution required, make an offer of legal aid on that basis, negotiate acceptance with the employing unit and individual, instruct legal representatives, and finally to review and settle bills for work done.

In December last year the Officer in Charge became ill which led to some reordering of work while his situation clarified. Sadly it has become clear that it will not be possible for him to return to ACLAA. In addition another experienced member of staff also became ill in January, and has not been able to return either.

While new staff were being recruited it was necessary to give priority to the allocation of legal aid to individuals to ensure that the legal process was not disrupted or delayed. Regrettably this meant that ACLAA was not able to assess and clear bills until the arrival of additional staff. Over the last month ACLAA staff have been working hard to deal with the backlog of bills that were awaiting payment and many have now been settled.

Any delay in payment is regrettable. However, ACLAA is currently being expanded and strengthened which should ensure that similar delays, caused by unforeseen circumstances, do not recur.

Service Personnel (Divorce)

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the divorce rates for serving military personnel in (a) the Army, (b) the Royal Navy and (c) the Royal Air Force for the last 12 month period for which figures are available. [120408]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 3 May 2000]: Due to the manner in which each Service records data on changes in marital status, it is not possible to provide information in the precise manner requested. Notwithstanding, the rates for 1998–99 by Service are as follows:

	Number/percentage
Army divorce rates 1998–99
Married strength at 1 April	57,744
Divorced (Decree Absolute and Annulments)	1,135
Proportion of married personnel Divorced	2.0%
Royal Navy—Widow, Divorce and Separation Rates 1998–99
Married Strength at 1 April	22,417
Widowed, Divorced or Separated	850
Proportion of married personnel Widowed, Divorced or Separated	3.8%
Royal Air Force—Divorce and Separation Rates 1998–99
Married Strength at 1 April	22,417
Divorced	10
Separated	1,172
Proportion of married personnel Divorced or Separated	3.4%

Note:
The Royal Navy figures include widows/widowers

Figures provided by the Office for National Statistics (ONS) for the married population between the ages of 20 and 34, which is broadly comparable with the average age of married Service personnel, indicate an annual divorce rate of approximately 3 per cent. The figures above show that the divorce rates in the Services on a comparable age group basis are no worse than those for society as a whole, especially as the RN and RAF figures include separation as well as divorce.

Eurocorps and EUROFOR

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many troops from (a) the UK and (b) other EU countries are committed to (i) Eurocorps and (ii) EUROFOR. [120820]

Mr. Hoon [holding answer 5 May 2000]: The UK has no troops committed to either the 5-nation (France, Germany, Belgium, Luxembourg and Spain) EUROCORPS or the 4-nation (France, Italy, Portugal and Spain) EUROFOR as a matter of course, though we have one Liaison Officer attached to HQ EUROCORPS.

Numbers of troops contributed to the forces in question by other countries are a matter for the countries concerned.

British Beef

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his Department's policy regarding the supply of British beef for consumption by members of Her Majesty's armed forces. [121073]

Dr. Moonie: The supply of food for the armed forces has been contracted out to "3663" and we require them to seek the best price in the open market, consistent with meeting our quality standard. I am as keen, however, on seeing our servicemen and women eating British products as I am for our contractor to secure best value for money. In the case of British beef, since autumn of 1998 we have been supplying 100 per cent. British beef to our armed forces personnel based in the United Kingdom. Supplies for armed forces personnel based overseas are currently sourced from a number of countries.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Health and Safety Executive

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proportion of oral and written complaints made by members of the public were fully investigated by inspectors of health and safety in field offices of the Field Operations Division in fiscal year 1999–2000. [118410]

Mr. Meacher: The information requested can not be produced at this time, because full year data on inspectors' work for the year ended 31 March 2000 are not yet available. However, data on the number of complaints followed-up by staff in HSE's Field Operations Directorate for the years 1997–98 and 1998–99 are set out in the table. The table also shows, for information, the number of complaints investigated as a percentage of those received.

Complaints followed-up by HSE's Field Operations Directorate by route of complaint

	1997–98	1998–99
Telephone	18,020	18,686
Letter	2,655	3,042
Oral (other)	322	276
Complaints followed up as a percentage of complaints received	72.6	76.7

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what was the average number of businesses dealt with by band 3 inspectors in the Health and Safety Executive in the last 12 months for which figures are available. [120390]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 2 May 2000]: Health and Safety Executive (HSE) Band 3 inspectors are used in the majority of sectors for which HSE has enforcement responsibility. Inspector contacts with businesses can vary considerably, depending on the sector and circumstances. Inspectors may contact the same business more than once during the course of the year, or may contact several operating sites owned by the same business. Also, a contact could involve an in depth audit, taking several days, or a short visit or meeting.

In total, HSE staff made 183,000 regulatory contacts with dutyholders and businesses in 1998–99, the last year for which figures are available. Of these, about 8,000 were made by administrative staff in HSE's Field Operations Directorate (FOD), and 33,000 by FOD inspectors other than Band 3 inspectors. A proportion of the rest may have involved inspectors other than Band 3 inspectors, but these could be disaggregated from the date only at disproportionate cost.

In total, approximately 500 Band 3 inspector staff years spent by HSE Operating Directorates and Divisions in 1998–99 on inspection, investigation and enforcement activity which would have generated the vast majority of regulatory contacts.

Air Traffic Control

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the New En-route Centre at Swanwick will be fully operational. [120786]

Mr. Mullin: The Swanwick Centre is scheduled to come into operation by spring 2002.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many overseas consultancy projects have been undertaken by National Air Traffic Services in the last three years; and where these projects were undertaken. [120789]

Mr. Mullin: In the past three years, NATS has undertaken a total of 30 consultancy projects. Projects were undertaken in, or on behalf of, the following countries: Abu Dhabi, Antigua, Australia, Bulgaria, Canada, Croatia, Eire, Finland, Hungary, Iceland, Israel, Japan, Libya, Malaysia, the Netherlands, Nigeria, Norway, Oman, Portugal, Singapore, Slovakia, South Africa, Spain, Syria, Switzerland, and the UK. In addition, NATS has participated in a number of consortiums on behalf of the European Organization for the Safety of Air Navigation (Eurocontrol).

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many aircraft movements there were at UK airfields without air traffic control services in the last 12 months. [120788]

Mr. Mullin: There are 142 airports licensed by the CAA. Eighty-eight do not have air traffic control services but published data on aircraft movements are available only for 11 of these. For these 11 airports, there were 100,000 movements, both commercial and non-commercial. There were a total of 3.5 million aircraft movements at all UK airports for which data are available.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is the average length of time taken to train an air traffic controller; how many are in training; and how many controllers are required to staff the airfields and centres under NATS control. [120784]

Mr. Mullin: Area Control (AC) Air Traffic Control Officers (ATCOs) receive 78 weeks training at the College of Air Traffic Control at Hurn followed by between 12 and 24 months on the job training before achieving validation. Airports ATCOs receive 52 weeks training at the College also followed by between 12 and 24 months on the job training before achieving validation. NATS has a total of 255 controllers currently in training (132 AC and 123 Airports—including part valid controllers). 436 controllers are required to staff the airfields under NATS control and 1,010 to staff the centres.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the suppliers of distress and diversion air traffic control to UK aircraft and aircraft using UK airspace. [120783]

Mr. Mullin: The Distress and Diversion (D&D) Air Traffic Control Service in the UK is provided to civil or military aircraft in distress or emergency in UK airspace. This service is supplied by RAF Air Traffic Control personnel located at the London Area and Terminal Control Centre (LATCC) and Scottish Area Control Centre (ScATCC).

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many air traffic controllers are needed to bring Heathrow up to full complement; and how many controllers are being trained at Swanwick. [120785]

Mr. Mullin: The total operational requirement for the Heathrow Visual Control Room and Thames Radar/SVFR is 61. There are currently 58 validated controllers. Two trainees are expected to validate within the next six to eight weeks together with one experienced ATCO undergoing retraining who is expected to regain validation within the same period. In addition, there are seven operationally valid Watch Managers at Heathrow.

The New En-Route Centre at Swanwick is scheduled to come into operation by spring 2002. Operational Conversion Training will begin in January 2001 to meet this requirement. A total of 380 Area Control ATCOs will undergo Operational Conversion Training prior to the operational date.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list those UK airports where (a) there is no air traffic control and (b) only (i) an air ground and (ii) flight information service is provided. [120787]

Mr. Mullin: The table lists UK airports where there is no air traffic control. Those with an Air/Ground service are indicated by A/G and those with a Flight Information Service, by FISO.

Social Services (Devon)

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what increase was allocated by his Department for social service provision in Devon County Council's standard spending assessment for 2000–01. [120090]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 2 May 2000]: The personal social services standard spending assessment for 2000–01 for Devon County Council increased by £5,326,769, or 5.2 per cent., compared with the previous year.

PFI Projects

Mr. Dobbin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what progress has been made with PFI projects in local government; and if he will list those projects endorsed so far. [120844]

Ms Beverley Hughes: A total of 126 projects across the country have been endorsed from 86 local authorities. Of these, 38 have reached contract signature and another 88 are rapidly progressing towards that stage. These projects are already bringing real improvements to the quality of life in local communities. A full list of the schemes endorsed is as follows. The list is updated regularly and is available on the DETR website http://www.local.detr.gov.uk/pfi.

Road User Charging

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will set national guidelines for road user charge exemptions and concessionary discounts. [121277]

Mr. Hill: We will consider issuing guidance to local authorities on road user charging exemptions and concessions in due course, to supplement those set through regulations.

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make regulations listing the classes of vehicles which will (a) receive discounts and (b) be exempt from road charging schemes. [121278]

Mr. Hill: Yes.

Rent Service Agency

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received regarding the operation of the Rent Service Agency in the last 12 months. [121204]

Mr. Mullin: We have received several representations regarding the Rent Service Agency and how rent officers perform their independent statutory functions in connection with housing benefit and registration of fair rents.

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what statutory powers are available to him in respect of the operation of the Rent Service Agency. [121205]

Mr. Mullin: The Rent Act 1977 (as amended) grants the Secretary of State power to appoint, remunerate and provide administrative support for rent officers carrying out their statutory functions. A framework document (which is deposited in the Library of the House) authorises the Chief Executive to carry out these powers.

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions on rent controls he has had with the Chief Executive of the Rent Service Agency in the last 12 months. [121208]

Mr. Mullin: We have regular discussions with the Chief Executive of the Rent Service Agency at official and ministerial level about how rent officers perform their independent statutory functions in connection with housing benefit and registration of fair rents.

Rent Acts (Maximum Fair Rent) Order 1999

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions which Minister in his Department is taking lead responsibility for the proposals contained in the Rent Acts (Maximum Fair Rent) Order 1999. [121206]

Mr. Mullin: The Rent Acts (Maximum Fair Rents) Order 1999 was signed by my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning on the basis of a collective decision by Government.

Landlord and Tenant Act 1985

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what external legal advice he has sought in respect of the use of his powers under section 31 of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1985. [121207]

Mr. Mullin: The Treasury Solicitors Department has sought the best advice through the usual channels.

Sustainable Development

Mr. Derek Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many meetings have been held at the Trade Union Sustainable Development Advisory Committee since its establishment; who attended them; what subjects were discussed; and if he will make a statement. [120419]

Mr. Meacher: Since the formation of the Trades Unions Sustainable Development Advisory Committee in July 1998 there have been six meetings. I have co-chaired them with John Edmonds, General Secretary of the GMB Union. They have been attended by representatives of the Amalgamated Engineering and Electrical Union, the Engineers' and Managers' Association, GMB, the Graphical Paper and Media Union, the Institute of Professionals, Managers and Specialists, the Manufacturing Science Finance Union, the National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers, the Transport and General Workers' Union, the Trades Union Congress, the Union of Construction, Allied Trades and Technicians, UNISON and the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers. The Committee has discussed a wide range of sustainable development issues, including climate change, the employment effects of environmental policies, environmental issues in the workplace and workplace training on energy efficiency.

Montreal Protocol

Mr. Derek Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is the extent of the United Kingdom's compliance to date with the terms of the Montreal Protocol; and when he expects full compliance to be achieved. [120421]

Mr. Meacher: The United Kingdom meets its substantive obligations under the Montreal Protocol (1987) through EC Regulation. The European Community and the UK have ratified the Protocol as well as its London (1990) and Copenhagen (1992) Amendments. In addition, they are bound by the adjustments to the Protocol adopted in London (1990), Copenhagen (1992), Vienna (1995) and Montreal (1997). The means by which the Community gives effect internally to all these obligation is EC Regulation 3093/94. Once a further EC Regulation, which is still under negotiation, enters into force later this year the Community and the UK will also be able to ratify the Montreal Amendment (1997).

Volatile Organic Compounds

Mr. Derek Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what safety guidance is issued in respect of the storage or use of volatile organic compounds (a) in and (b) near NHS premises; and if he will make a statement. [120426]

Mr. Meacher: The Health and Safety Executive has issued no specific safety guidance on the storage or use of volatile organic compounds (VOC) in and near NHS premises.

The Management of Health and Safety at Work Regulations 1999 requires all employers to assess the risks to people's health and safety from the undertaking, which would include the storage or use of substances such as VOCs, and to take steps to minimise the risk.

Refrigerants

Mr. Derek Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what guidance (a) his Department and (b) NHS Estates gives to health service bodies tendering for refrigeration equipment. [120418]

Mr. Meacher: The model framework for greening Government operations—which Government departments have been encouraged to adopt or adapt to meet their special circumstances—promotes environmentally preferable refrigerants having a zero or low potential for ozone depletion or global warming. I cannot answer for NHS Estates as responsibility here rests with the Secretary of State for Health. However, it is DETR's policy not to buy refrigerants containing chlorofluorocarbons (CFCs) and to avoid hydrochlorofluorocarbons (HCFCs) and other ozone-depleting substances where there are suitable alternatives. Our policy is also to favour technologies and refrigerants with little or no potential to contribute to global warming where they are safe, cost effective and practicable. Advice on environmentally preferable refrigerants is given in DETR's "Green Guide for Buyers" and other guidance which can be found on DETR's website. There are however circumstances—especially with retrofits—where currently available environmentally preferable technologies and refrigerants are not safe or are excessively costly. We are continuing to put pressure on our suppliers to develop more cost effective, safer and greener products.

Mr. Derek Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions he has had with fire safety experts about the implications of installing (a) hydrocarbon and (b) ammonia-based refrigeration as part of air conditioning systems in public places; and if he will make a statement. [120420]

Mr. Meacher: It is the responsibility of any person or company installing hydrocarbon or ammonia-based air conditioning equipment in a public place to ensure that all fire and safety issues are properly addressed. Such installations should follow the guidance set out in British Standard (BS 4434): "Specification for safety and environmental aspects in the design, construction and installation of refrigerating appliances and systems (1995)". The Health and Safety Executive were on the technical committee that drafted BS 443.

Mr. Derek Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is his policy on the storage and use of (a) hydrocarbons, (b) HFCs and (c) ammonia in (i) refrigeration and (ii) air conditioning systems used by health service bodies. [120423]

Mr. Meacher: The Management of Heath and Safety at Work Regulations 1999 require all employers, including health service bodies, to carry out an assessment of risks to people's health and safety form the undertaking, including the effects of hazardous substances. This would include an assessment of the risks from hydrocarbons, HFCs and ammonia used in refrigeration and air conditioning systems.

Mr. Derek Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is his estimate of the quantity of (a) HFC, (b) HCFC, (c) ammonia, (d) hydrocarbons and (e) CFCs in use in the UK in (i) refrigeration, (ii) air conditioning, (iii) aerosols, (iv) metered dose inhalers and (v) other applications. [R] [120429]

Mr. Meacher: The most recent estimates available are given in the table. Data on the use of ammonia and hydrocarbons in the air conditioning and refrigeration sectors are not available; however, their use is relatively minor. In addition, the majority of aerosols manufactured in the UK are filled with hydrocarbons, but data on the amounts used are not available.

	Refrigeration	Air conditioning	Aerosols	Metered dose inhalers	Other applications
HFCs	7,685	3,766	1,020	121	23 (foam)
HCFCs	13,500	4,000	0	0	Not known
Ammonia	Not known	Not known	0	0	Not known

SOCIAL SECURITY

Unclaimed Benefits

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the total value by benefit of unclaimed benefits for the latest 12 months for which figures are available. [119851]

Angela Eagle: The latest estimates were published in a Departmental press release dated 24 September 1999. I have placed a copy in the Library.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has also recently launched a substantial national take-up campaign for the Minimum Income Guarantee. The campaign will include; a national TV advertising campaign;

writing to over two million pensioners whom Departmental records suggest are most likely to be entitled to the minimum income guarantee; and a new free telephone claim service for people to claim without having to leave their homes.

State Pension

Dr. George Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the net cost after taxation of an increase in the basic State Pension of (a) £5 per week at age 75 and (b) £10 per week at age 80 years. [120548]

Mr. Rooker: The information is in the table.

Estimate of the net cost after taxation of an increase in the basic State Pension of £5 per week at age 75 and £10 per week at age 80 years

£ billion

	£5 increase at 75–79, £10 increase at 80
Gross cost	1.7
Net cost after income-related benefits offset	1.15
Net cost after income-related benefits offset and taxation	1

Notes:

1. All costs are in £ billion, rounded to the nearest £50 million, and are for 2000–01.
2. Other benefits, whose rates are linked to the basic State Pension, are not included.
3. Gross costs estimated by the Government Actuary's Department.
4. Income-related benefits offsets estimated by Analytical Services Division, Department of Social Security.
5. Income tax receipts estimated by the Inland Revenue.

Occupational Pensions

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many pensioners in receipt of (a) income-related benefits, (b) National Insurance-related benefits and (c) in total receive income from an occupational pension. [120360]

Mr. Rooker: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

Pensioner benefit units in receipt of occupational pension income Great Britain, 1997–98

Occupational pension income recipients also in receipt of:	Pensioner benefit units in receipt
Income related benefits	910,000
National Insurance related benefits	4,060,000
All with occupational pension income	4,090,000

Notes:

1. Estimates are rounded to the nearest 10,000 benefit units, although they are not necessarily accurate to that degree.
2. Pensioner benefit units are defined as single (non-cohabiting) people over State pension age (men 65 and over, women 60 and over) and couples (married or cohabiting) where the man is over State pension age.
3. Income-related benefits include Income Support, Family Credit, Housing Benefit, Council Tax Benefit and Social Fund Grants.
4. National Insurance-related benefits include State Retirement Pension, Widows' Benefits and Incapacity Benefit.
5. Estimates of benefit income are based on survey respondents' identification of different elements of benefit income, and are therefore subject to misreporting. For example, some respondents may not be able to differentiate between State Retirement Pension and Income Support since both benefits are received in a single payment.
6. Estimates of the number of pensioner benefit units in receipt of occupational pension are based on survey respondents' own assessment and may be subject to under-reporting.

Parental Leave

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people have claimed Income Support during parental leave in the last 12 months. [120350]

Mr. Bayley: The new Income Support rules on parental leave came into effect on 5 January 2000. Early indications from a number of offices are that only a handful of claims have been received so far.

Benefit Payments

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people chose to have child benefit and pensions paid by automatic transfer into bank accounts in each year since 1992. [120803]

Mr. Rooker: The information is in the table.

Number of customers in receipt of child benefit and pensions choosing payment into a bank account since 1992.

Year[1]	Number of child benefit customers choosing ACT	Number of retirement pension and widows pension customers choosing ACT[2]
1992	1,505,425	2,392,292
1993	1,594,600	3,043,118
1994	1,741,875	3,315,930
1995	1,880,650	3,543,713
1996	2,063,150	3,854,419
1997	2,241,275	4,014,874

Number of customers in receipt of child benefit and pensions[1] choosing payment into a bank account since 1992.

Year[2]	Number of child benefit customers choosing ACT	Number of retirement pension and widows pension customers choosing ACT[3]
1998	2,436,900	4,272,662
1999	2,620,075	4,554,997

[1] "Pensions" has been interpreted as referring to retirement (RP) and widows (WP) pension, for which details are only available as a combined number.
[2] Date as at November of each year.
[3] These figures exclude pensioners who are entitled to Income Support and receive a combined payment, and include customers resident overseas.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list, for each of the main social security benefits, how many people in each of the last 12 months have contacted his Department and its agencies requesting that their benefit payment be switched to a post office from payment into a bank account. [120987]

Mr. Rooker: The Department does not routinely collate the information requested.

However, as the overall trend on all benefits is an increase in payment into a bank account, it is unlikely that a significant number of customers are changing from payment into a bank account to payment at the post office.

Correspondence

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when the hon. Member for Walsall, North will receive a reply to his letter of 7 March to the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency regarding a constituent (Ref. E24618). [121260]

Angela Eagle: A reply was issued to my hon. Friend on 4 May 2000.

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he will respond to the letter from the hon. Member for North Thanet dated 11 April concerning non-payment of widows' payment to Mrs. Corrina Smith and similar cases. [121110]

Angela Eagle: A reply was issued today.

Child Benefit

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the distribution of Child Benefit expenditure according to (a) the gross income bands, (b) the equivalised gross income bands and (c) the equivalised net income bands of recipient families using (i) each band of £5,000 up to £40,000 and (ii) over £40,000. [121104]

Angela Eagle: The information is in the table.

Expenditure on Child Benefit by band of income and the number of children in each income band

Notes:
1. Information is taken from Households Below Average income (HBAI) 1997–98 based on the Family Resources Survey 1997–98.
2. All figures are in April 1999 prices.
3. The expenditure of Child Benefit has been estimated using benefit receipt on HBAI. Therefore the expenditure in this table will not exactly match published expenditure figures.
4. The figures in parentheses are the number of children in each band of income.
5. Estimates of expenditure are rounded to the nearest £100 million. Numbers of children are rounded to the nearest 100,000.

Disability Living Allowance

Ms Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what percentage of appeals against decisions to refuse Disability Living Allowance were successful in (a) Wales, (b) Scotland and (c) England in the last year for which figures are available. [120931]

Angela Eagle: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

Figures for each of the appeals service regional offices

	Total	In appellants favour	Percentage
Great Britain	51,827	25,234	48.7
Birmingham	5,442	2,398	44.1
Cardiff	6,886	3,438	49.9
Glasgow	8,402	4,072	48.5

Sutton	4,766	2,790	58.5

Notes:
1. The figures relate to all Disability Living Allowance (DLA) appeals heard between 1 January 1999 and 31 December 1999.
2. We are unable to identify the reason for the appeals against DLA decisions. The figures will include appeals for other reasons as well as refusal of benefits.

Pensioner Incomes

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate how many pensioners would benefit financially and what the average benefit would be from reducing the tariff income from capital from the present rate to £1 per week for every £500 over £6,000 for people aged over 60 years. [121274]

Mr. Bayley: The information is in the table.

The estimated number of pensioners benefiting and the average gain as a result of a reduction to the tariff income of £1 a week for every £500 over £6,000

	Total gainers (000)	Average gain (£1s per week)
Income Support (IS)	60	4.55
Housing Benefit (HB)	80	3.70
Council Tax Benefit (CTB)	160	1.25

Notes:
1. Cases have been rounded to the nearest 5,000 for each benefit, and prices to the nearest 5 pence.
2. This costing is carried out following the extension of the capital limits to £6,000 and £12,000 for Income Support, and £6,000 and £16,000 for Housing Benefit, and has been adjusted to caseload forecasts for 2001–02.
3. It is not possible to provide a total number of gainers overall, as there is considerable overlap. Gainers on HB and/or CTB may float on to IS, while gainers on HB may also gain CTB.

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the cost of reducing the tariff income from capital from the present rate to £1 per week for every £500 over £6,000 for people aged over 60 years. [121275]

Mr. Bayley: The information is in the table.

The estimated cost of reducing the tariff income to £1 a week for every £500 over £6,000 in 2001–02

£ million

Benefit	Total cost
Income Support	15
Housing Benefit	15
Council Tax Benefit	10
Total	40

Notes:
1. This question has been answered using the Policy Simulation Model (PSM) for Income Related benefits, based on 1997–98 Family Resources Survey data.
2. Figures are rounded to the nearest £5 million and uprated to 2000–01 prices and benefit levels.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Tritium

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much Tritium has been produced at the Chapelcross nuclear facility in each month since April 1995; and what percentage of the Tritium produced by this facility has been traded to Governments and agencies outside the United Kingdom. [120750]

Mr. Hoon: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Member to the answers I gave to the hon. Member for Angus (Mr. Welsh) on 3 April 2000, Official Report, column 303W, and my hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Smith) on 3 May 2000, Official Report, columns 118–19W.

Export Licences

Mr. Berry: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry for what reason the 1998 Annual report on Strategic Exports does not include information about physical exports of strategic goods from the UK to the Channel Islands. [120204]

Dr. Howells: Details of the value of UK exports and of the number of weapons including small arms was taken from information collected by HM Customs and Excise for trade statistics purposes. For these, the Channel Islands are regarded as part of the UK and thus movements between the UK and the Channel Islands are not recorded.

However, the 1997 and 1998 Annual Reports on Strategic Export Controls listed by country of destination the numbers of export licences issued and refused in each equipment category and gave details of the military equipment for which licences had been granted. They also set out the value of defence exports to each country. Entries were included for the Channel Islands.

Energy Production

Sir Robert Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what percentage of Scottish energy production is from (a) nuclear power, (b) coal, (c) oil and (d) renewable sources. [120747]

Mrs. Liddell: The most recently available figures for the indigenous production of primary fuels in Scotland are for 1998. Data are, however, not available without disproportionate cost for oil (or gas) production from Scotland or Scottish waters, so it is not possible to calculate the shares of nuclear power, coal or renewables.

	Million tonnes of oil equivalent Scotland
Nuclear	4.8
Coal	5.2
Oil	[2] —
Renewables	[3]0.7–0.9

[1] Not available
[2] The Department's annual report "Development of the Oil and Gas Resources of the United Kingdom", copies of which are available in the Library of the House, contains details of the location and production of oil and gas from all fields on the UK Continental Shelf.
[3] Renewable energy production statistics are collected on a UK wide basis only. The figure for Scotland is an estimate mainly based on generating capacities at 31 December 1998.

Competitiveness Development Fund

Mr. Stevenson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the allocation from the Competitiveness Development Fund to the West Midlands Region; and if he will list schemes supported by the fund in the North Staffordshire sub-region. [120396]

Mr. Caborn: The DTI's Competitiveness Development Fund (CDF) is available to Regional Development Agencies (RDAs) to spend on priorities they identify for increasing competitiveness in their regions. The CDF allocation to Advantage West Midlands (the RDA for the West Midlands Region) for this Financial Year (2000–01) is £440,000, which represents an increase in funding of over 75 per cent. compared to the previous financial year.

Advantage West Midlands used its CDF allocation of £250,000 for the last financial year (1999–2000) to support a wide range of projects that were designed to have a region-wide effect: none were specifically limited to North Staffordshire. These projects included work on promoting enterprise and innovation, encouraging best practice and developing supply chains.

Sellafield

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received from (a) Members of Parliament, (b) representatives from other parliaments and assemblies and (c) Ministers from other Governments, in respect of the dangers posed by the operation of Sellafield, in each month since January 1999; and what response he has made. [120712]

Mrs. Liddell: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has received a number of representations by correspondence, Parliamentary Question or in person in relation to the safety of operations at Sellafield. Each has been carefully considered and appropriate responses, addressing the issues raised, have been provided. The table lists the representations made since January 1999. In the case of Parliamentary Questions, the responses were of course published in Hansard.

February 1999	2	0
May 1999	0	1
July 1999	1	0
August 1999	1	0
September 1999	1	0
October 1999	1	0
November 1999	2	0
December 1999	0	0
January 2000	1	0
February 2000	2	2

Note:
There have been no representations from public representatives from the Scottish Parliament or Welsh Assembly (b).

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessments have been undertaken by (a) his Department and (b) the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate/Health and Safety Executive of the (i) accident risk and (ii) accident consequences of the operation of Sellafield since May 1997. [120713]

Mrs. Liddell: It is for the licensee of a nuclear site—BNFL in the case of Sellafield—to assess both the accident risk and potential accident consequences of its operations as part of a comprehensive safety case for each operation. This information must be updated with changing circumstances. As required under the terms of the Sellafield site licence conditions these safety cases are presented to the Site Nuclear Safety Committee, which includes independent members.

The role of HSE is to analyse these safety cases in detail to verify that they are sound. Regular on-site inspections by the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate (NII) seek to confirm that the limits and conditions contained in the safety cases are complied with in the plant at all times. HSE/NII publishes information about its assessments of particular plant from time to time; a recent example is its report "The storage of liquid high level waste at BNFL, Sellafield", which deals with the B215 complex which includes the highly active liquor tanks.

The Department of Trade and Industry has no role in this independent regulatory process.

Motor Industry (State Aid)

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 17 April 2000, Official Report, column 323W, concerning state aid to the motor industry, where the EU publishes information about rules and criteria for these purposes. [120741]

Mr. Alan Johnson: Under Article 87(1) of the Treaty of Rome (as amended by Amsterdam), the Commission may develop 'appropriate measures' for State aid by issuing frameworks or codes. These frameworks describe the practice the Commission intends to follow when examining aid proposals, and generally set limits on the intensity of assistance which may be paid within the State aid rules.

The framework are published in the Official Journal, and are available in full on the Commission's website at www.europa.eu.int/comm/dg04/lawaid.htm.

The Official Journal reference for the Motor Vehicle framework is: OJ C279, 15.9.1997.p1.

Employment and Tribunal Claims

Ms Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 13 April 2000, Official Report, columns 273–76W, concerning employment and tribunal claims, if he will make it his policy to produce separate statistics for Wales, England and Scotland; and if he will provide the figures requested on that basis. [121045]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The Employment Tribunals Service (ETS) records information on tribunal applications, for statistical purposes, by the office where they are handled rather than by the place where the action arose. ETS offices may, for operational and judicial reasons, handle cases arising in England or Wales and it is not therefore possible to provide figures in the form requested. Tribunals operate within the same policy framework across Great Britain and I have no plans to change the current policy on provision of such figures.

Telecommunications Council

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the outcome of the Telecommunications Council held in Brussels on 2 May; and if he will make a statement. [120991]

Ms Hewitt: There was an orientation debate on the review of the regulatory framework for electronic communications. During the debate all member states supported the general approach of the Commission on regulation of access to infrastructures in order to promote competition. A number, including the UK, welcomed the Commission's proposal that regulation should be on a co-regulatory basis with business where possible. Regarding the new institutional structure, member states welcomed the Commission's intention to build on the existing structure, but define the roles of any new bodies. On the scope of universal service, most member states, including the UK, supported the Commission's proposal to retain the existing scope of universal service, but to keep this under review.

The Commission presented its Communication on the World Radiocommunication Conference 2000 and the Council adopted Conclusions giving broad support to the Communication.

The Commission also presented a number of recent or forthcoming Communications concerning: the results of its consultation on creation of the EU internet top level domain; organisation and management of the internet; unbundled access to the local loop; and gave an update on the forthcoming postal services liberalisation Directive. The Council also noted Presidency reports on the outcome of the Conference on Digital Terrestrial Television, and the Ministerial Conference on Knowledge and the Information Society held in Lisbon on 17–18 February and 10–11 April 2000 respectively.

A3XX Project

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assumptions were made in his Department's appraisal of the A3XX project about the likely demand for these aircraft from airlines flying into and out of UK airports, with specific reference to Heathrow. [121027]

Mr. Alan Johnson: In appraising the A3XX project the Department undertook a full market study of the aircraft's prospects. Details of this report are commercially confidential, but a key market rationale of the A3XX is to carry large numbers of passengers from hub to hub. We would therefore expect Heathrow to be one of the airports where the A3XX would operate. The A3XX has been designed to meet the most stringent environment and noise standards.

Assisted Areas Map

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will re-include the Farnworth and Kearsley wards in the assisted status map as it affects the Bolton metropolitan borough. [120846]

Mr. Caborn: The consultation period on the amended proposals for the new Assisted Areas ended on 2 May. The Government are considering carefully the representations received, including those relating to Bolton, and will be discussing the representations received with the European Commission. The new Assisted Areas are subject to approval by the Commission.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information about wards included in and excluded from the assisted areas map was given to representatives of the media by (a) ministers, (b) special advisers and (c) officials in his Department before Monday 10 April. [121049]

Mr. Caborn: No advance information about wards included in or excluded from the revised assisted areas map was distributed to the media before Monday 10 April.

Zenith Milk

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if Zenith Milk will be permitted to process milk. [120807]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 5 May 2000]: The Director General of Fair Trading (DGFT) has advised that Milk Link, Axis and Zenith, the three successors to Milk Marque, have been operating independent arrangements for the marketing and selling of their members' milk this winter.

Following that advice, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry announced on 2 May that, on the basis that the assurances given last year of independent operation will continue to be observed, he can see no reason why Milk Link, Axis and Zenith should not establish or extend their processing activities if they choose to do so.

The assurances given were that all policy making and selling of milk would be carried out independently by each of the successors with no joint ventures between the new businesses in marketing or processing milk, with no common directors and no shareholdings by any one of the new businesses in either of the others. Milk Marque also stated that they would not supply to the successor bodies, after 31 March 2001, central services which could not be split prior to the reorganisation which took place last year.

Should the new businesses choose to extend their processing activities through acquisition they will of course be subject to the merger provisions under competition law in the same way as any other company. In addition, Milk Link, Axis and Zenith must, like all undertakings, operate their businesses in accordance with both domestic and European competition law.

Second Class Post

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on his policy on the future of the second class post. [121267]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The Government have no proposals to abolish second class mail. The Post Office tell me that no such proposals have been submitted to the Post Office Board, nor are any expected.

Ilisu Dam

Ms Kingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 13 April 2000, Official Report, column 273W, which British banks are included in the lending syndicate for the Ilisu Dam project. [121019]

Mr. Caborn: The lending syndicate for the Ilisu Dam project has not yet been formed, and is unlikely to be formed until after the export credit agencies have made their decisions regarding support for the project.

Sudan

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent discussions he has had with BP Amoco concerning its investment with Talisman Energy and the China National Petroleum Corporation operating in Sudan. [120269]

Mr. Caborn [pursuant to his reply, on 2 May 2000, c. 29W]: I would like to point out that BP Amoco has no operations or investment in Sudan. Furthermore, BP Amoco's business and ethical policies preclude such involvement.

WALES

Corus

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what recent meetings he has had with Corus; and if he will make a statement. [120930]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I have had meetings with the Chief Executive of Corus and visited the Corus Steelworks at Shotton.

The Government recognise that Corus is one of the most efficient steel producers.

The Government fully understand the importance of a successful manufacturing sector; steel is making a vital contribution to the economy and employment.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Pig Farming (Aid)

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress has been made by the EU Commission in setting up a regulatory fund to aid pig farmers. [119704]

Ms Quin: The European Commission has come forward with a proposal to introduce a European Regulatory Fund for pig producers. An initial statement about the proposal was made by the European Commission at the Agriculture Council on 17 April. As presented, it does not provide for funding from the EU Budget; rather it is proposed to be a voluntary fund, financed by pig producers themselves.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Chester Amphitheatre

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, what arrangements have been made to allow archaeological research to be undertaken at the Amphitheatre, Chester, before construction commences on a new court building on any part of that site. [121272]

Jane Kennedy: The site is owned by a developer, David McLean Developments Ltd., with whom the Court Service has entered into an agreement to lease. Following demolition of the British Telecommunications building which occupied the same footprint as the new building, David McLean Developments Ltd. funded an intensive series of archaeological excavations in consultation with the City Archaeologist and English Heritage. These excavations impacted upon the design of the building and as a result it has been possible to avoid disturbing the remains of the amphitheatre beneath. In fact, the foundations of the new building have been carefully designed to avoid any remains and to preserve them in situ, for posterity.

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, if a binding contract has been signed for the construction of a new court building on any part of the Amphitheatre site in Chester. [121271]

Jane Kennedy: The Court Service signed a legally binding contract with the Developer, David McLean Developments Ltd., on 20 December 1999 whereby the Court Service is legally bound to occupy the building within 21 days of the completion of its construction. The Court Service were aware of the location of the site and of its archaeological significance, but all appropriate approvals in relation to both planning and preservation had been obtained by the developers.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Railways

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made of the independent review of Northern Ireland railways, which was published on Tuesday 28 March; and if he will make a statement. [119563]

Mr. Ingram: The Government welcome the publication of the strategic safety review of Northern Ireland Railways. The extensive recommendations cover all aspects of the operation of the system and the Government are considering, with Translink, how best to target developments. A high level task force has been created to report as soon as possible on the options for the future of the railways in Northern Ireland.

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what measures the Government will adopt to improve the railway service in Northern Ireland. [119562]

Mr. Ingram: A task force has been established that will identify, within the wider strategic context of the future development of transportation in Northern Ireland, a range of options for the future of the railway network. It will look at the costs, benefits and affordability of these options. The task force is expected to present its assessment by the summer. The future level of funding for the railway system in Northern Ireland will be considered as part of the 2000 Spending Review.

Parades Commission

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what factors led to the decision to increase the remuneration for the Chairman of the Parades Commission, commencing with the February appointment of a new person to that post. [119831]

Mr. Ingram: The decision was based on the need to secure as wide a pool of candidates as possible for the post.

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations were made during his Department's review of the Parades Commission against changing more than half of the commissioners from the previous Commission when appointing the new Commission; and what such representations were made in the six months prior to the commissioners' appointment. [119842]

Mr. Ingram: The composition of the Parades Commission was outside the terms of reference of the review, and no representations were received along the lines indicated.

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many times the full membership of the Parades Commission has met since the new members were appointed in February. [119841]

Mr. Ingram: Since the appointment of the new members to the Parades Commission, the Chairman and six members have met on three occasions and a further 11 meetings have been attended by a quorum of at least three members.

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many days the Chairman of the Parades Commission has spent in Northern Ireland since his appointment in February. [119832]

Mr. Ingram: Between the 17 February and the 27 April 2000, the Chairman of the Parades Commission has visited Northern Ireland on 11 occasions, for a total of 20 days and 11 nights.

Royal Victoria Hospital

Mr. Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to his answer of 6 April 2000, Official Report, column 568W, on the Royal Victoria Hospital, how much of the Royal Group of Hospital HSS Trust's funding was spent on the new railings and perimeter wall of the hospital. [119783]

Mr. George Howarth: It is estimated that approximately £87,000 of Trust capital funding will be used for this part of the project. The remainder of the Trust's contribution will be provided from charitable funds and a public appeal.

Birth Certificates

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland for what purposes his Department requires a birth certificate to be furnished by (a) employees, (b) contractors, (c) those applying for employment and contracts and (d) other persons. [120315]

Mr. Ingram: The Northern Ireland Office, Northern Ireland Government Departments and their respective Agencies may ask individuals to provide their birth certificate in a range of circumstances. An individual's birth certificate may be used for one or more of the following reasons:

proof of identity
proof of eligibility under the Civil Service nationality rules

Environmental Protection Agency

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he will establish an Environmental Protection Agency for Northern Ireland. [120754]

Mr. George Howarth: There are no plans at present to establish an Environmental Protection Agency for Northern Ireland. The Environment and Heritage Service, a Next Steps Executive Agency within the Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland, was set up on 1 April 1996 to assume operational responsibility for environmental issues. At devolution, the Northern Ireland Assembly decided to place environment and heritage responsibilities in the new Department of the Environment. I would expect any re-examination of the way in which such matters are handled to be considered by the devolved administration.

Sellafield

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in relation to plutonium pollution arising from processing activities at the Sellafield Mixed Oxide Plant, in respect of the hazards posed to (a) people, (b) flora and (c) fauna in Northern Ireland. [120708]

Mr. George Howarth: Lord Dubs, then Minister for the Environment in Northern Ireland, and his officials were kept informed by Ministerial colleagues in Whitehall regarding the commissioning and full operation of the Mixed Oxide Plant (MOX Plant), including projected environmental impact on the people, flora and fauna. In particular, during early 1997 and 1998 the Environment Agency held three consultation exercises regarding the commissioning and operation of the MOX plant and the variations to Certificates of Authorisation to dispose of gaseous and liquid wastes from the Sellafield site.

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will establish a study into the environmental effects of the operation of Sellafield on the (a) flora, (b) fauna and (c) fisheries of Northern Ireland. [120709]

Mr. George Howarth: Responsibility for the subject in question has been delegated to the Environment and Heritage Service under its acting chief executive, Mr. J. R. Lamont.

I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from J. R. Lamont to Mr. Eddie McGrady, dated 3 May 2000:

As Acting Chief Executive of the Environment and Heritage Service (EHS), I am responsible for operational aspects of protection of the environment on behalf of the Department of the Environment. I am responding to the Parliamentary Question you put down on 26 April asking for a study into the environmental effects of the operation of Sellafield on the flora, fauna and fisheries of Northern Ireland.

In Northern Ireland, a comprehensive monitoring programme which is operated by EHS's Industrial Pollution and Radiochemical Inspectorate, has been in place since the early 1970s. The programme is reviewed on an annual basis to ensure that any changes in discharges from the Sellafield Plant are carefully assessed.

Discharges into the Irish Sea from the Sellafield Plant are authorised by the Environment Agency. The Centre for Environment, Fisheries and Aquaculture (CEFAS), formerly the Ministry of Agriculture Fisheries and Food (MAFF) has been sampling and analysing seawater, fish, shellfish, seaweed and sediments in the Irish Sea since the early 1950s. In Northern Ireland, our Inspectorate arranges for samples of seaweed, sediments, fish, nephrops, mussels and winkles to be collected quarterly and forwarded to the CEFAS Research laboratory at Lowestoft. The seaweeds are collected in the Ards Peninsula area and at Portrush and the marine life samples are obtained as far as possible from commercial landings, at Kilkeel and Portavogie. Sediments samples are collected from Northern Ireland's 5 marine loughs.

The Northern Ireland results are published annually in a report entitled "Radioactivity in Food and the Environment" issued by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (MAFF) and the Scottish Environment Protection Agency (SEPA) and also in the Northern Ireland Abstract of Statistics. The levels of radioactivity measured indicate that they are of negligible radiological significance.

In addition to this programme, the Inspectorate monitors with gamma dose rate in air over intertidal sediments in each district council area which has a coastline. The results indicate minimal radioactivity deposition and are consistent with normal background levels.

We have also undertaken a number of collaborative studies with the Radiological Protection Institute of Ireland and University College Dublin since 1990. A copy of the joint report on Carlingford Lough is available in the Library of the House of Commons.

I can report that on average, people in Northern Ireland receive 2500 microsieverts of radiation a year from all natural and artificial sources; 50 per cent. is due to exposure to radon in the home. 12 per cent. from medical exposure and nuclear discharges accounts for less than 0.1 per cent.

In view of the comprehensive information already available from the monitoring programme there are no plans to establish a separate study at this time. I can assure you, however, that the Department will continue with the monitoring programme in view of local concerns.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Church Repairs

34. Miss McIntosh: To ask the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, what recent discussions he has held with the Financial Secretary on reducing VAT on church repairs. [119907]

Mr. Stuart Bell: Following my Adjournment Debate last November, the Church has kept in close touch with the Government. The hon. Lady will be aware that Ministers have confirmed that there is no general relief from VAT on repair costs for churches and the Government's current agreement with their European partners means that new zero rates cannot be introduced. While there is no provision for a reduced rate of VAT under Annex H to the Sixth Directive, it applies only to social housing and not churches.

The Church will continue to press its case for a more equitable tax position in this field.

Investments

36. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, what are his estimates of the Church's return on investments for the next three years. [119909]

Mr. Stuart Bell: The Church Commissioners' policy is to be fully invested in asset classes which experience shows should yield the most satisfactory returns over the long term. Their forecasts are accordingly directed towards the longer timescale.

Clergy

37. Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, if he will make a statement on the terms and conditions of employment of the clergy. [119910]

Mr. Stuart Bell: Terms and conditions vary slightly from diocese to diocese, but should include a stipend (based on a national stipend benchmark of £16,420) free accommodation (or a housing allowance) and the full reimbursement of all working expenses. Clergy are not employed, but are office holders.

Church Running Costs

38. Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, what contribution the commissioners have made towards the running costs of the Church of England in 1999. [119911]

Mr. Stuart Bell: In 1999 the Commissioners contributed £156.1 million in support for the Church's ministry, including an element targeted specifically towards parish ministry in those dioceses most in need of financial help. The total meets some 20 per cent. of the Church's overall running costs of approximately £760 million in 1999.

The larger share of the Church's running costs is provided by parishioners. This includes the major new commitment taken on by parishes in the shape of funding clergy pensions earned after 1998.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Pre-school Education

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many places have been available in local authority-run playgroups in each of the past seven years for each local authority; and if he will make a statement. [117271]

Ms Hodge: Virtually all playgroups are in the voluntary sector with only a few run by local education authorities. Information about places in local authority-run playgroups is contained in tables, copies of which have been placed in the Library. The Department has collected information on playgroup places in England only since 1998. Prior to 1998, information on playgroups was collected by the Department of Health and their national figures have also been shown in the table for completeness.

My Department plans to publish provisional national information about places in local authority-run playgroups (as at 31 March 2000) in July.

New Deal for Schools

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list each grant made to schools in Shrewsbury and Atcham under the New Deal for Schools programme; and if he will make a statement. [120369]

Jacqui Smith: The following table shows the allocations made to schools in Shrewsbury and Atcham under the New Deal for Schools programme, which formed part of the total allocation of £5,677,761 made to Shropshire Local Education Authority.

Class Sizes (Infants)

Mr. Michael J. Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many infant classes had over 30 pupils in (a) 1997, (b) 1998, (c) 1999 and (d) 2000 in the City of Worcester. [120594]

Ms Estelle Morris: Information on key stage one class sizes collected in January for the Parliamentary constituency of Worcester is shown in the following table.

Provisional national estimates of key stage one class sizes for January 2000 were recently published in a Statistical First Release 'Class sizes in maintained schools in England: January 2000 (15/2000)' on 12 April 2000. Class size information broken down by local education authority area is also available from the House of Commons Library.

National figures for Infant class sizes in September 1999 were published in Statistical First Release 'Infant class sizes in England (2/2000)' on 21 January 2000.

[1] Provisional

National Anthem

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the teaching of the National Anthem in state schools. [121020]

Jacqui Smith: There are opportunities to teach about the National Anthem in the curriculum, which schools may take up if they wish.

Key Stages 2 and 3

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will request that the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority cease the practice of selling Key Stages 2 and 3 past papers to BBC Educational. [121093]

Jacqui Smith: No. The QCA has a contract with BBC Educational allowing them to publish past Key Stages 2 and 3 test papers together with a guide book for parents. The test papers are reproduced for the previous year in order to help parents understand the nature of the test which their children are taking. The approach is consistent with two general policies of making the tests available for general use and encouraging parents to help their children prepare for the tests.

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to improve the training of end of Key Stage 2 test markers. [121092]

Jacqui Smith: The Qualifications and Curriculum Authority (QCA) has responsibility for the development, administration and marking of the National Curriculum tests, on behalf of the Secretary of State, and takes considerable care in the development and marking arrangements for all the tests. This was reflected in the findings of the Rose Review, an independent cross-party panel set up last year to consider the test development and assessment arrangements at Key Stage 2. As part of the quality control of marking, each external marking agency evaluates the training programme for each year and makes recommendations for change or improvement. In addition the QCA seeks the views of a sample of markers on all aspects of the process, including training. Such feedback is put into the continuous programme of improvement conducted year-on-year.

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment whether he expects teachers to check the marking of end of Key Stage 2 test papers on their return from the external marking agency. [121090]

Jacqui Smith: Teachers are not expected to check the marking of test papers on their return from the external marking agency. However, teachers may wish to use the tests as a means of providing feedback to pupils on their performance and, in order to do this, they would have to review the pupils' marks against the markscheme. It is for schools to decide whether and how to use the tests in reviewing pupils performance. Teachers may also have doubts about the final level awarded to any pupil. If they decide to request a formal review of the marking in the test, they would need to refer to the markscheme in order to identify errors and provide a reason for a review.

Anti-drugs Policy

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what discussions he has had with the directors of London education authorities on developing the Government's anti-drugs policy in schools within their authority areas. [121121]

Jacqui Smith: The main vehicle for anti-drugs education is the Personal, Social and Health Education Framework which was issued in November 1999. This was developed after extensive national consultation, and the views of Local Education Authorities were taken on board as part of that process.

Jobcentre, Chelmsford

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many vacancies were notified to the Chelmsford jobcentre in each of the last 12 months for which figures are available. [120347]

Ms Jowell: The number of vacancies notified to the Chelmsford Jobcentre during the months April 1999 to March 2000 were as follows.

May	718

Jobseeker's Agreement

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what procedure is followed in cases where a jobseeker and an employment office cannot reach agreement on the details of a jobseeker's agreement; and if he will make a statement. [120081]

Ms Jowell: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its Chief Executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mark Neale to Mr. Lembit Opik, dated 8 May 2000:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency the Secretary of State for Education and Employment has asked Leigh Lewis to reply to your question about the procedure that is followed where a jobseeker and an employment officer cannot reach agreement on the details of a Jobseeker's Agreement. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to Mr. Lewis as Chief Executive of the Employment Service. I am replying in his absence.

Jobseeker's Allowance regulations set out the conditions for the receipt of Jobseeker's Allowance (JSA). These include a requirement that a jobseeker must have a Jobseeker's Agreement which both the jobseeker and the employment officer have signed. The contents of the Agreement are negotiated between the Jobseeker and the employment officer at the initial interview when a claim for JSA is made.

If the adviser and Jobseeker cannot agree the Jobseeker's Agreement, the case is referred to an independent Sector Decision Maker for consideration.

The Sector Decision Maker can determine the contents of a Jobseeker's Agreement and issue a direction that the jobseeker should comply with. The direction will state what the contents of the Jobseeker's Agreement should be and enable the jobseeker to satisfy the availability and actively seeking employment conditions. If the Jobseeker's Agreement is not signed by the jobseeker following the Decision Maker's determination, the Jobseeker's Agreement will not be valid and Jobseeker's Allowance will not be paid.

I hope this is helpful.

PRIME MINISTER

"Wiring it Up"

Mr. Chope: To ask the Prime Minister from what date conclusion No. 1 of the Performance and Innovation Unit report, "Wiring it Up", took effect for Cabinet Minsters; and what steps were taken to draw this to their attention. [114387]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 13 March 2000]: Conclusion number one of the Performance and Innovation Unit's report, "Wiring it Up", took effect from the date of its publication on 13 January 2000. I am, of course, in regular touch with Cabinet Ministers about their responsibilities. In addition, in explaining their work to new Cabinet Ministers I will take account of conclusion number one.

Sellafield

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Prime Minister what representations he has received from councillors in the United Kingdom and Republic of Ireland in respect of Sellafield since 1 April. [120251]

The Prime Minister: I have received one representation from a councillor in the Republic of Ireland in respect of Sellafield since 1 April.

Depleted Uranium

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 12 April 2000, Official Report, column 200W, on the use by NATO of depleted uranium against Yugoslavia, what steps he will recommend that NATO takes to monitor (a) Serbian civilians, (b) ethnic Albanian civilians, (c) the environment of Western Kosovo and (d) the environment of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia for the effects of the use of depleted uranium. [119503]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 3 May 2000]: As my earlier answer noted, NATO is co-operating with the United Nations in the on-going work of the UN Environment Programme into the environmental consequences of the Kosovo conflict. The United Kingdom has contributed over £50,000 to this work. We will study carefully the conclusions reached by the UNEP Balkans Task Force.

London Mayor

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister what contacts he has had with the Mayor-elect of London; and if he will make a statement. [120934]

The Prime Minister: I spoke to the Mayor by telephone during the course of the weekend. I will have further conversations and meetings with him as appropriate.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if it is his policy that the value of toys and groceries given by charities to those seeking asylum should be deducted from benefits paid to such persons. [119919]

Mrs. Roche: In determining whether an applicant for support is eligible for support and if so what the appropriate level of support should be, the National Asylum Support Service will take into account substantial and continuing support to meet accommodation or other essential living needs being provided by charities (or any other body or person) to the asylum seeker. The Service will normally disregard one off or very small donations of groceries or other support.

Donations of toys whether from charities or any other source will not be taken into account.

Birth Certificates

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department for what purposes his Department requires a birth certificate to be furnished by (a) employees, (b) contractors, (c) those applying for employment and contracts and (d) other persons. [120317]

Mr. Straw: Birth certificates are one of the documents requested as proof of identity and age for recruitment and pension purposes. They are also normally required for the issue of passports and for applications to remain in the United Kingdom on the basis of marriage to a British Citizen. My Department does not normally require existing employees or contractors to provide birth certificates.

Crime Fighting Fund

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the number of police he intends should be recruited nationally in 2000–01 as a result of the crime fighting fund; and what the cost will be of this recruitment. [120486]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary to the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe) on 6 April 2000, Official Report, columns 595–96W. I hope to make the promised announcement shortly.

Drugs Misuse

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs will consider the Police Foundation's report. [120375]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs is an independent body and, therefore, I cannot speculate on its consideration of the Police Foundation report into the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971. I can confirm however that copies of the report will be sent to members of the Council for information ahead of its next meeting on 25 May.

Juvenile Secure Estate

Mrs. Golding: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what methods of physical control and restraint will be used in the new juvenile secure estate; if different methods will be used according to the age of the child; and how the use of control and restraint will monitored. [120590]

Mr. Boateng: The methods of physical control and restraint currently in use in the juvenile secure estate vary according to the type of accommodation in which a young person is held.

Local authority secure units use a variety of control and restraint methods in line with Department of Health guidance. Secure training centres use physical control in care methods which are approved by the Home Secretary. Prison Service Young Offender Institutions follow control and restraint methods which may be used to resolve incidents involving violent prisoners of all ages and of both sexes.

The Youth Justice Board for England and Wales is responsible for monitoring regime standards and performance across all forms of juvenile secure accommodation. The Board intends to conduct a review of methods of physical control and restraint in juvenile secure accommodation with a view to identifying and promoting good practice.

Prisoners (Home Life Background)

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people there were in prison in (a) 1970, (b) 1980 and (c) 1999, broken down by those who were children of (i) intact families and (ii) broken families. [120662]

Mr. Boateng: The information requested is not centrally recorded. However, a survey undertaken by the Office for National Statistics, "The National Prison Survey 1991" by Tricia Dodd and Paul Hunter (available through The Stationery Office), of persons held in prisons in England and Wales at the beginning of 1991 found that, of those inmates interviewed (around 3,800), 62 per cent. had lived with both parents for most of their childhood. Comparable information for other years is not available.

Young Offenders (Home Life Background)

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many adolescent murderers in (a) 1980 and (b) 1999 grew up living apart from at least one parent; and what percentage of adolescent murderers this represented. [120669]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The information requested is not available centrally.

There were, however, 84 persons aged between 10 and 20 convicted of homicide in England and Wales in 1980 (including 40 convicted of murder) and 70 in 1998, the latest year for which figures are available (including 31 convicted of murder).

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of young people on supervision orders came from broken homes in (a) 1980 and (b) 1999. [120670]

Mr. Straw: The information requested is not held centrally. 18,300 supervision orders were made in 1980. 12,400 were made in 1998, the most recent year for which figures are readily available.

Family Research Funding

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list, for each of the last three years, recipients of funds provided by his Department for research into the family, indicating the amount paid to each recipient. [120657]

Mr. Straw: In the two years prior to 1999, the Home Office provided no funding for research into the family. Since April 1999, my Department has provided funds for voluntary organisations under the Family Support Grant. In 1999–2000, over 30 voluntary organisations shared £1 million to develop support for parents and families.

The purpose of these grants is to develop and disseminate good practice in family support. They are not, in the majority of cases, made to directly fund research. However, several of the projects which were funded last year contained an information gathering and analysis component:

The National Family and Parenting Institute was awarded a total Government grant of £636,000 in 1999–2000. The Home Office provided £200,000 of the total funding, of which £38,800 was spent on research.

The Family Policy Studies Centre received £43,213 to improve the delivery of their information products and services to existing users in the family support field, and to extend access to new users. It received a further £3,000 in March 2000 to contribute to the costs of an analysis of data from the Fourth National Study of Ethnic Minorities. The Race Equality Unit is a national organisation which helps to develop better social care services for black and minority ethnic communities. It received funding of £46,483 to develop a parenting programme and materials for ethnic minority parents, which included research.

Gingerbread, a national organisation offering support to lone parents, received £10,000 to conduct research into the needs of lone fathers for practical, emotional and social support.

The National Youth Agency (NYA) and Youthnet were both awarded funds to facilitate the 'Listen Up' dialogue between Government and young people, in order that young people's views inform future policy and service delivery for young people. The organisations spent £26,[illegible]05 on the research element of this project.

The marriage charity One Plus One received joint funding from the Home Office and the Lord Chancellor's Department to develop a marriage information booklet for couples planning to marry. This included £8,658.50 of Home Office funding spent on research.

Secure Training Centres

Sir Peter Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many children have been re-admitted to each of the secure training centres (a) for breach of the order and (b) under a new sentence. [120623]

Mr. Boateng: The secure training order under the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 was implemented on 1 March 1998 and was replaced by the detention and training order under the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 on 1 April 2000. The custodial part of the secure training order could be served in a secure training centre or a local authority secure unit if no secure training centre place was available.

389 offenders were sentenced to a secure training order. 46 of them were returned to custody by the courts for the breach of supervision requirements following release and 31 were later sentenced to a secure training order for a further offence. A breakdown of this information for each secure training centre is not currently available and I will write to the right hon. Member when it has been prepared.

Leave to Remain Indefinitely

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what is the recommended time scale for applications for leave to remain indefinitely to be processed by the Immigration and Nationality Directorate; [120738]

(2) what the average processing time is for immigration applications for leave to remain indefinitely. [120737]

Mrs. Roche: There was a reorganisation of caseworking practices in the Immigration and Nationality Directorate at the beginning of 1999, and an analysis of decisions taken subsequently has not yet been undertaken. But over 70 per cent. of new applications are decided within a week under fast track procedures. The remainder of new applications will normally be decided within six weeks. There is no recommended time limit for deciding these applications.

Animal Experiments

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many animals were used in bio-medical research in (a) 1970, (b) 1980, (c) 1990 and (d) in the latest 12 months for which figures are available; what restrictions he applies on their use; and if he will make a statement. [120395]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Animals are used only in scientific procedures where fully justified, for example in medical research to prevent disease or reduce illnesses for people or other animals; also, where there are no valid alternatives and where the benefits outweigh the costs to the animals involved.

The commentary in the "Statistics of Scientific Procedures on Living Animals Great Britain 1998" records the number of procedures or experiments conducted each year since 1946. These figures cover all scientific procedures involving the use of protected animals and do not separately identify those relating to biomedical research. The figures for the years requested are:

Year	Million
1970	5.7
1980	4.3
1998	2.6

Although there have been a few years when small rises were recorded, including 1998, there has been a steady decrease in the number of procedures performed since 1970. This reflects advances in science that have allowed the replacement of animals in scientific procedures, the reduction of the numbers of animals used per procedure and the refinement of those procedures. This Government's decisions to end some categories of animal use, such as cosmetic testing, have also made a contribution. More recently, there has also been a downward trend in the use of conventional animals, offset by an increase in the use of genetically modified animals. These trends also reflect recent scientific advances.

Figures for 1999 are due to be published in July.

Criminal Records Bureau

Mr. Todd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will announce a scale of charges for checks on the criminal records of volunteers working with children. [120746]

Mr. Charles Clarke: When the Criminal Records Bureau comes into operation, it will be expected to recover its costs through charges for the certificates that it will issue, on application, to individuals. Until the Bureau's operating costs have been determined, it will not be possible to fix the charges, but the cost has previously been estimated at between £5 to £10, depending on the type of certificate requested. There are no plans to have a separate scale of charges for volunteers working with children.

Prison Industries

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list (a) the annual expenditure and (b) the annual income of prison industries in England and Wales in each of the last 10 years. [120686]

Mr. Boateng: The information requested is given in the table.

Expenditure and income of prison industries 1990–91 to 1999–2000

£ million

		Income
	Expenditure	Own consumption	Commercial
1999–2000	26.685	42.495	10.456
1998–99	28.889	39.200	8.172

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total value of contracts between Prison Service industries and external customers in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available. [120691]

Mr. Boateng: The majority of Prison Service sales contracts are with the Ministry of Defence and other Government Departments and are formulated on a framework basis. As such, the value of the contract may not have a direct relationship to actual sales. The figures given in the table are for actual sales and, therefore, provide a more accurate representation of commercial work undertaken. The figures include sales from agribusiness as well as industries.

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the annual turnover of prison industries and farms in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available. [120687]

Mr. Boateng: The information requested is given in the table. For the years 1990–91 to 1995–96, the value of amenity costings have been excluded to bring the data in line with successive years, when these costings were discontinued following the agribusiness review undertaken by the Prison Service in January 1997.

Prison Workshops

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on each of the pilot prisons involved in the first tranche of the Workshop Expansion Scheme, with special reference to (a) the number of work places available, (b) hours of work, (c) prisoner wages and (d) the annual turnover of the workshops. [120684]

Mr. Boateng: The information on the number of work places available, hours of work and annual turnover of workshops is given in the table.

The data apply to industries only and excludes agribusiness. It has been extracted from locally-supplied workshop control and hours reports.

Information on prisoner wages is unavailable, as this is not recorded centrally.

Prisoners' Earnings Act 1996

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to bring the Prisoners' Earnings Act 1996 into force; and if he will make a statement. [120688]

Mr. Boateng: I am determined that as many prisoners as possible should make a contribution to their keep. Officials will be reporting shortly on the outcome of work they have been doing on the extent to which the Prisoners' Earnings Act 1996 can contribute to this objective and I will then consider the options.

Prisons (Resource Employment Places)

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the number of resource employment places in prisons in England and Wales in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available, broken down by type of activity. [120693]

Mr. Boateng: Prior to 1994 accounts were submitted centrally covering industries' and farms' output but following devolution of funding to establishment level this has not been a requirement. Therefore, from 1995–96 the figures have been extracted from data supplied as part of the Prison Service accounts. The available information is given in the table.

Magistrates Courts

Mr. Hurst: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the costs to each police authority in England and Wales consequent upon the closure of magistrates courts within their area from 1 January 1995 to 31 December 1999. [R] [121029]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The information on which such establishments could be based is not held locally.

Internet

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate has been made of the costs of intercepting internet traffic by the Government's new computer centre, GTAC; and how these costs will be distributed between internet service providers and the Government. [121022]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Government have allocated £25 million to establish the Government Technical Assistance Centre. I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe) on 6 April 2000, Official Report, column 596W.

Separately, Clause 12 of the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Bill establishes a power to require communication service providers to maintain a reasonable intercept capability. The particular nature of the requirements will be spelt out in detail in subordinate legislation subject to affirmative resolution. The requirements are likely to change as technology develops.

The Government are currently considering a detailed independent report on how interception might be achieved on the internet and how much it might cost. Existing policy on the allocation of cost is set out in that report which can be found at http..//www.homeoffice.gov.uk/oicd/ripbill.htm.

Richard Lewis (Pardon)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will grant a pardon to Richard Lewis, also known as Dic Penderyn; and what representations he has received on this issue. [121127]

Mr. Straw: I have no plans to grant a posthumous Free Pardon for Richard Lewis. I have not recently received any representations in support of a pardon, but I would, of course, be prepared to look at this case should such representations be received.

Illegal Entrants

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many clandestine illegal entrants have been discovered in vehicles arriving at United Kingdom ports in each month for the last 12 months for which figures are available. [121289]

Mrs. Roche: Information is recorded centrally on the numbers of persons issued with notice of illegal entry as clandestine entrants. Figures for April 1999 to March 2000 are given in the table. This information is collated by the date of issue of notice of illegal entry and does not contain details of the date of entry to the United Kingdom. The central record does not differentiate between those persons detected in vehicles at ports of entry and those persons whose clandestine entry came to light at a later stage.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of the stowaways he witnessed being discovered at Dover on Wednesday 26 April (a) have claimed asylum and (b) remain in the UK. [121286]

Mr. Straw: Of the nine individuals whose discovery I witnessed on 26 April, six are known to have claimed asylum and are still in the country. Information concerning the three others is not yet available to me but I shall write to the hon. Member as soon as it is.

Violent Crime

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the incidence of crimes of violence in (a) Gwent, (b) other Welsh Police Authority areas and (c) English Police Authority areas. [120935]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The latest recorded crime figures published for the period October 1998 to September 1999 show the total of all violent crime, which includes violence against the person, robbery and sexual offences, to be:

Area	Offences per 100,000 population
(a) Gwent	2,151
(b) All other police areas in Wales	962
(c) Police areas in England	1,159

Under the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, local authorities and the police working in partnership are required to develop local strategies for reducing crime and disorder. For the partnerships in Gwent, the key priorities and targets in their local strategies include tackling: drugs and alcohol misuse; anti-social behaviour, including neighbourhood disorder; youth disaffection and offending by young people; and violent and hate crime.

Sick Prisoners

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will recommend that remission of sentences granted to sick prisoners because of their illnesses be reviewed when the prisoner has recovered. [120928]

Mr. Boateng: Section 36 of the Criminal Justice Act 1991 allows for release from prison on compassionate grounds in exceptional circumstances. Remission of sentence was abolished with the introduction of the 1991 Act.

Decisions to release prisoners under section 36 of the 1991 Act are rare. Release is granted only where strict criteria are met and where it is considered that release will not place the safety of the public at risk.

Where a prisoner's exceptional circumstances warrant release on compassionate grounds, he or she must comply with the conditions contained in their release licence. If he or she fails to comply with those conditions, or if his or her behaviour after release indicates that there is reason to revise the original risk assessment, the licence can be revoked and the individual returned to custody. Current policy is that improvement in an individual's medical circumstances are not, on their own, sufficient reason to revoke a licence. There are no plans to change this policy.

Home Detention Curfew

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer to the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe), of 2 May 2000, Official Report, column 75W, on the home detention curfew scheme, what offences were committed by the prisoners released before the requisite period; and what was the (a) sentence received, (b) requisite period and (c) sentence served in each case. [121074]

Mr. Boateng: My reply to the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe), of 2 May 2000, Official Report, columns 74–75W, indicated that 12 prisoners had been released on the Home Detention Curfew scheme before the end of the requisite period. Further inquiries have revealed that in one case the prisoner was in fact released on the correct date. The available information, therefore, shows that since the Home Detention Curfew scheme commenced in January 1999, a total of 11 prisoners have been released early.

The original offences committed by the prisoners released on Home Detention Curfew before the requisite period, the sentence received, the requisite period and the sentence served in 10 of the 11 cases, are shown in the table. The table also shows additional days awarded (ADAs) as a result of a prisoner breaching the prison disciplinary code. As explained in my reply of 2 May, in a number of cases the early releases were due to the prison's failure to take into account the additional days awarded. A further prisoner, sentenced to two years and six months in respect of an offence of wounding (inflicting grievous bodily harm), was released on Home Detention Curfew before the end of the requisite period of 398 days due to an error in the original sentence calculation. The prisoner was returned to custody after 15 days. He was subsequently released at his automatic conditional release date, his second Home Detention Curfew application having been refused. He served a total of 442 days.

Original offence	Sentence received	Requisite period	Sentence served
Robbery (assault with intent)	3 years 6 months (1,277 days)	580 days + 10 ADAs	588 days
Importation of drugs	2 years 6 months (912 days)	397 days + 10 ADAs	397 days

European Football Championship Matches

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to ensure the safety of British football fans travelling to European Football Championship matches. [119875]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Government are doing everything possible to help the host countries provide a safe and secure environment for all football fans attending the European Championships in Holland and Belgium in June. We established a Euro 2000 Co-ordinating Group in October to ensure that Government, police and other United Kingdom preparations are comprehensive and complementary. There has been considerable liaison and consultation with the Dutch and Belgian authorities who are responsible for the management and security of supporters attending the tournament. This high level of co-operation will continue up to and throughout the tournament.

Police Helicopters (South Wales)

Ms Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many criminals were caught as a direct result of the use of police helicopters by the South Wales Police in (a) 1996–97, (b) 1997–98, (c) 1998–99 and (d) 1999–2000; and how much stolen property was recovered as a direct result of the use of helicopters; [120835]

(2) how much it cost to operate the police helicopter tracker car recovery system used by the South Wales Police in the financial years (a) 1996–97, (b) 1997–98, (c) 1998–99 and (d) 1999–2000 broken down by the cost of (i) hire of helicopters, (ii) cost of staff and (iii) other costs. [120864]

Mr. Charles Clarke: In 1999–2000, the helicopter used jointly by South Wales Police and Gwent Constabulary was responsible for over 200 arrests and the recovery of £200,000 worth of stolen property. Information relating to previous years and to the use of the tracker recovery system is not immediately available and I will write to my hon. Friend once the details have been collected.

Disorder (Central London)

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what statues and buildings were vandalised during the disorder in central London on 1 May; what lasting damage was done; how many people have been (a) arrested for and (b) charged with damaging the statues and buildings; and if he will make a statement. [121044]

Mr. Straw: The statues in Parliament Square, for which the Royal Parks Agency have responsibility, were defaced to varying degrees. Remedial work on these is currently being undertaken by specialist contractors and much of the superficial graffiti have already been removed. Seven statues and monuments, including the Cenotaph, for which English Heritage has responsibility, were also vandalised. English Heritage advise me that no lasting damage was done to any of their monuments. The graffiti on the Cenotaph were removed in time for the wreath laying ceremony at lunchtime last Thursday by the Danish Resistance Movement.

The Metropolitan police advise me that damage was also caused to 19 buildings in and around the vicinity of Whitehall, Trafalgar Square and the Strand. Serious damage was caused to McDonald's in Whitehall. I understand that a total of 13 people have been arrested so far for criminal damage, of whom four have been charged.

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans were drawn up in respect of the protection of (a) the statue of Sir Winston Churchill in Parliament Square and (b) the Cenotaph prior to the disorder of 1 May; for what reasons, and on whose authority, it was decided not to protect them; how many persons have been (i) arrested and (ii) charged with vandalising the statue and the Cenotaph; what steps the police are taking to arrest other such persons; and if he will make a statement. [121075]

Mr. Straw: I understand that both the Royal Parks Agency who have responsibility for the statues in Parliament Square and English Heritage who have responsibility for seven other statues and monuments, including the Cenotaph, damaged during the May Day disturbances, considered whether the statues and monuments should have been boarded up before the demonstration but decided not to do so. I understand that one factor which was taken into account by the Agency and English Heritage was a concern to avoid the hoarding being used as weapons in the event of violence.

Figures for arrests and charges for criminal damage to individual statues and monuments is not available. The Metropolitan police advise me that 13 people have been arrested for criminal damage and that four of these have so far been charged. Police investigations into the disturbances are continuing.

CABINET OFFICE

Duchy Benevolent Fund

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how much has been paid from the Duchy Benevolent Fund to organisations and individuals in each year since 1995. [119850]

Marjorie Mowlam: Grants made by the Duchy of Lancaster Benevolent Fund for the past five years are as follows:

1995–96	251,637
1996–97	316,425
1997–98	277,014
1998–99	290,957
1999–2000	[1]310,800

[1] Unaudited

Lists of grants made from the Fund for the last five years would run to several hundred items.

Press Officers

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many press officers are employed in the Cabinet Office; and how many were employed in (a) 1996–97, (b) 1997–98 and (c) 1998–99. [119977]

Mr. Stringer: The average number of press officers in post in the Cabinet Office Press Office in 1996–97 was seven; 1997–98 was 10.2; 1998–99 was 12.3 and in 1999–2000 was 16.7.

In addition, a dedicated press office was set up in March 1999, to co-ordinate Government media activity on the Year 2000 Millennium Bug problem. The Unit was set up by the President of the Council. The total number of full-time press officers employed over the year was five.

Civil Service Code

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office when she proposes to give statutory backing to the Civil Service Code. [120025]

Marjorie Mowlam: The Government have given a commitment, in principle, to give statutory backing to the Civil Service Code. The Government have a heavy forward legislative programme and will take this legislation forward as and when a suitable opportunity arises.

Special Advisers

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what was the (a) number and (b) cost of foreign visits undertaken by special advisers within her Department since May 1997. [119932]

Marjorie Mowlam: For the financial years 1997–98 and 1998–99, I refer the hon. Member to the answer to the hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) on 17 May 1999, Official Report, column 242W. For 1999–2000, Special Advisers accompanied me or my predecessor overseas on five occasions at a cost of £2,022. This includes one visit at no cost to public funds. In addition, the UK Anti-Drugs Co-ordinator and his deputy travelled overseas on six occasions at a cost of £3,935. This includes two visits at no cost to public funds.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

FA Cup Final

12. Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what plans Ministers in his Department have to attend the Football Association cup final. [119885]

Kate Hoey: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I have both received invitations to attend the FA Cup Final. My right hon. Friend is planning to go to the match, but I shall be at another sporting engagement.

World Cup Final

13. Mr. Grogan: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on the progress made in implementing the Broadcasting Act 1996 with reference to television coverage of the 2002 and 2006 football world cup finals tournaments. [119886]

Mr. Chris Smith: The World Cup finals tournament is a listed event under Part IV of the Broadcasting Act 1996. Under the terms of that Act and of the Independent Television's Code on Listed Events, live television coverage of the World Cup finals tournament must be offered on fair and reasonable terms to BBC 1, BBC 2, Channel 3 (ITV) or Channel 4.

Wembley Stadium

15. Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what recent discussions he has held with local authorities regarding the proposed new Wembley stadium. [119888]

Kate Hoey: Neither I nor my right hon. Friend can or should intervene in any of the planning discussions which have recently been taking place between WNSL and Brent. The Wembley Task Force (including Nigel Mobbs, Brent etc. and DCMS officials) has been very active in promoting the wider regeneration of the area, and we are keeping in close touch with their work.

Mr. Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if (a) he and (b) members of the Wembley Maintenance Committee have discussed with Brent Council a section 106 agreement for transport infrastructure investment in connection with the granting of planning consent for the redevelopment of Wembley Stadium; and if he will make a statement [119121]

Kate Hoey: Planning issues including section 106 agreements are solely a matter for the London Borough of Brent. Therefore, neither Ministers nor officials from the Department have discussed section 106 agreements for transport infrastructure with the London Borough of Brent. Similarly, this is not an issue which the Wembley Monitoring Committee has discussed with the London Borough of Brent though individual members of the Committee, such as Wembley National Stadium Ltd., have had such discussions in the course of their normal business. The Wembley Task Force has discussed a range of transport and other infrastructure issues relating to the wider Wembley regeneration area but this has not included negotiation of section 106 agreements which are a matter for the London Borough of Brent and relevant developers.

Seaside Towns

16. Shona McIsaac: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what assessment he has made of the allocation of national lottery funds to seaside towns. [119889]

Mr. Chris Smith: The National Lottery funds numerous projects which bring widespread benefits to seaside towns. Research jointly commissioned by my Department and the Lottery distributors into Lottery funding in the coalfields and other areas does however suggest that resort and retirement towns have made relatively fewer applications and have received less per capita than the national average. A second phase of the research, to be published shortly, will seek to identify the reasons for the low level of Lottery funding in certain areas and recommend ways of redressing the balance. I have directed distributors to ensure that there is the widest possible access in all parts of the country to Lottery funding and that funding contributes to reducing social and economic deprivation.

Creative Industries

17. Jane Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what steps he is taking to support new businesses in the creative industries sector. [119890]

Janet Anderson: Through the work of the Creative Industries Task Force, we are tackling a number of generic issues of importance to creative businesses, including the problem of accessing seed and start up capital. We are also addressing these issues at a sectoral level, for example through the work of the Music Industry Forum and the Film Finance Forum. My Department works closely with the Department of Trade and Industry and HM Treasury in taking this work forward.

Professional Football

19. Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when he last met representatives of the Football Association and the Football League to discuss the state of professional football in England. [119892]

Kate Hoey: With my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, I met the Chief Executive of the Football Association and the chairman of the Football League on 16 March to discuss a range of football issues. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State subsequently met the Chief Executive of the Football Association on 6 April.

National Lottery

20. Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when he next plans to review the guidelines for the allocation of money to good causes by the national lottery. [119893]

Mr. Chris Smith: The guidelines for applicants for National Lottery funds are a matter for the National Lottery distributing bodies within the framework of the directions I have given them. My Department is working with the Lottery distributing bodies to ensure that their application systems are as user-friendly as possible.

Space for Sport and Arts Scheme

21. Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when the first grants will be made to primary schools under the Space for Sport and Arts scheme. [119894]

Kate Hoey: My officials are now in the process of working up further details about the scheme with the Department for Education and Employment and Lottery distributors and we hope to be in a position to invite applications in the autumn.

Sports (Eastern Region)

22. Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what support he plans to give for sports development in the Eastern region. [119895]

Kate Hoey: A great deal of support is already being given to sports development in the Eastern Region through the Lottery Sports Fund and other programmes operated or funded by Sport England.

Film Industry

23. Ms Ward: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what benefits the new Film Council will bring to the British film industry. [119896]

Janet Anderson: The Film Council brings together in one body the previous mechanisms for Government film support. It has the remit and resources to deliver, for the first time, a comprehensive strategy for the development of a sustainable film industry.

Mr. White: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what assessment he has made of the impact of his recent measures to support the film industry. [119891]

Janet Anderson: Over the past three years, we have put in place a more effective framework of support for film and have forged a much closer working relationship with the film industry. The Film Policy Review led to a range of positive developments, including the creation of the Skills Investment Fund and the British Film Office in Los Angeles, and culminated in the launch of the Film Council, which last week announced the first phase of a comprehensive strategy for the development of the film industry.

Football Clubs

24. Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what steps he is taking to encourage football clubs to give supporters a greater say in the running of their clubs. [119897]

Kate Hoey: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced the Supporters Trusts initiative last October. The resulting body—Supporters Direct—has been operational in shadow form since 27 January. Supporters Direct is designed to offer advice and funding to groups of supporters wishing to invest responsibly in Premiership and Football League clubs.

Free Television Licences

25. Mr. Hopkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many families in Luton, North will benefit from the introduction of free television licences for households with a member aged 75 or over. [119898]

Janet Anderson: I would refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to my right hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones), of 2 March 2000, Official Report, column 350W.

Digital TV (Wales)

26. Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on digital television broadcasting in Wales. [119899]

Mr. Chris Smith: The Government will ensure that all viewers in Wales who presently receive analogue television will be able to receive the main free-to-air channels digitally, before the analogue transmissions are fully switched to digital. Digital television has extended choice to Welsh viewers by enabling S4C and Channel 4 to be broadcast as separate digital services in Wales.

School Sports

27. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what his plans are for increasing the number of sports taught at or by schools. [119900]

Kate Hoey: The National Curriculum requires schools to offer the opportunity to participate in games, athletics, dance, gymnastics, outdoor and adventure activity and swimming. Within these broad areas it is for schools to determine which sports to pursue. The Government would encourage schools to offer as broad a range of sporting activity as possible, but recognise that this can sometimes be difficult. That is why we are working with Sport England and the Youth Sports Trust on a scheme to establish up to 600 schools sport co-ordinators, who will work in families of schools to encourage better links and sharing of facilities. This will mean that pupils will benefit from a wider range of activities than if their school were operating in isolation.

Analogue Television

28. Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what his latest estimate is of the date for the switch-over from the analogue TV signal. [119901]

Mr. Chris Smith: We have estimated 2006–10 for switch-over.

Scientists

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what steps his Department is taking to encourage young scientists to apply to NESTA for financial support. [119887]

Mr. Alan Howarth: NESTA exists to support creative and talented individuals of all ages. Anyone with exciting and new ideas for products and industrial processes can apply for support under NESTA's Invention and Innovation programme, which came on line last December and will shortly be making its first awards. Exceptionally talented individuals, including promising young scientists identified by NESTA appointed nominators, may be supported under NESTA's Fellowship programme. Finally NESTA's Education Programme is intended to support schemes aimed at popularising science, technology and the arts, particularly among the young.

HEALTH

Cancer Services

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what assessment his Department has made of the effectiveness of (a) Irinotecan and (b) Oxaliplatin; and if he will make a statement; [118961]

(2) what steps he has taken to mark National Bowel Cancer Awareness Week; [118962]

(3) if he will list those health authorities which fund all eligible bowel cancer patients with (a) Irinotecan and (b) Oxaliplatin in the last 12 months for which figures are available. [118964]

Yvette Cooper: On the 2 May, the Minister of State for Health announced that the National Institute of Clinical Excellence will be asked to consider a range of cancer drugs for appraisal of their clinical and cost effectiveness. These will include irinotecan, oxaliplatin and raltitrexed for colorectal cancer.

Detailed spending information on cancer services, including drugs, is not currently held centrally.

I attended the launch of the National Bowel Cancer Week on 10 April. In addition, we have made available £10 million each year since 1998 to improve access to diagnosis and treatment of colorectal cancer. From July 2000, all patients suspected of having colorectal cancer will be guaranteed an outpatient appointment within 14 days of their general practitioner marking an urgent referral.

Female Genital Mutilation

Ms McCafferty: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he has taken to promote health education among groups affected by the practice of female genital mutilation. [119190]

Yvette Cooper: Education is central to eradicating the brutal practice of female genital mutilation (FGM). We fund a range of educational projects in Britain. This year we have awarded the London Black Women's Health Action Project a section 64 project grant of £25,000 for 1999–2000 for their training and resource project. This project aims to educate and raise awareness of FGM among healthcare providers, facilitate training of trainers programmes and seminars, and to produce and disseminate educational materials.

The Department also provides financial support to FORWARD, the leading voluntary organisation on this issue, through the section 64 grants scheme. This support includes core grant funding of £25,000 for 1999–2000 to 2001–02, to help meet the organisation's running costs. Over the last few years, the Department has provided funds totalling nearly 280,000 for projects developed by FORWARD in the United Kingdom. Additionally, the Department for International Development has committed over £200,000 for two projects in which FORWARD are involved in Nigeria and The Gambia.

The sexual health strategy currently being developed will be looking at health promotion needs including those of particular cultural groups.

Ms McCafferty: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what mechanisms are in place to ensure that the Prohibition of Female Circumcision Act 1985 is enforced. [119188]

Yvette Cooper: The Prohibition of Female Circumcision Act 1985 makes it an offence to carry out the procedures known as female circumcision. It also makes it an offence for anyone to aid, abet, counsel or procure the carrying out of these procedures by any other person on her own body.

There have been no prosecutions under the Act since it came into force. The lack of prosecutions for this offence is only because of the small number of complaints made to the police and the difficulty of obtaining evidence where a complaint is made. Encouraging the education of professionals and practising communities is a more effective tool for eradicating female genital mutilation.

Ms McCafferty: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures he has taken to prevent young girls being taken out of the country for the purpose of female genital mutilation. [119189]

Yvette Cooper: The Prohibition of Female Circumcision Act 1985 makes the procedure of female genital mutilation (FGM) illegal. As well as this Act, legal protection for girls is also provided by the Children Act 1989. If a local authority has reason to believe that a child is likely to suffer significant harm, it is obliged to make such inquiries as it considers necessary to enable it to decide whether it should take any action to safeguard or promote the child's welfare. Under the Act, a Prohibited Steps Order can be made to prevent parents carrying out a particular act without the consent of the Court (eg removing the child from the United Kingdom so that mutilation can be carried out abroad).

Further protection is offered under the Criminal Justice (Terrorism and Conspiracy) Act 1998. This Act makes it an offence for a person to conspire to commit an offence outside the United Kingdom, provided the substantive offence constitutes an offence both under the law in the UK and under the law in the country in which the act is committed. Therefore if parents take their daughters abroad to have them mutilated this would be an offence if FGM is also an offence in the country to which they are travelling.

Genetic Data

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what Code of Practice covers his Department's data matching activities; and if he will place a copy in the Library. [119525]

Ms Stuart: The Department does not have a Code of Practice governing data matching activities. However, where patients may be identified from the data held, the Department adheres to the good practice principles developed by the Caldicott Committee. A copy of the Caldicott Report, published in December 1997, is in the Library.

Tuberculosis

Mr. Breed: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to authorise a renewal of the programme of tuberculosis vaccinations within secondary schools. [120402]

Yvette Cooper: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles) on 10 February 2000, Official Report, column 261W.

Mr. Breed: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the recent trend in the incidence of tuberculosis in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [120371]

Yvette Cooper: The United Kingdom has an excellent record of tuberculosis (TB) control and we are determined this should remain the case.

The incidence of TB is monitored by the Public Health Laboratory Service (PHLS). Official notifications of TB gradually fell to an all time low of 5,086 in England and Wales in 1987 from about 50,000 cases a year in the 1950s and 9,000 cases at the beginning of the 1980s. Since the early 1990s, there have been overall small year on year increases in total notified cases which are continuing. Provisional notifications for 1998 were just over 6,000. While some of this increase may be due to better ascertainment of cases, it has occurred against the backdrop of a worldwide resurgence of this disease that will, inevitably, continue to have some impact on TB in the UK through travel and immigration.

The results of the latest in a series of five-yearly detailed surveys of TB in England and Wales undertaken by the PHLS on behalf of the Department are reported in the Communicable Disease Report Vol. 9, No. 51 (17 December 1999), copies of which are available in the Library.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many cases of (a) human tuberculosis (mycobacterium tuberculosis), and (b) bovine tuberculosis (mycobacterium bovis), were confirmed in humans in (i) 1997, (ii) 1998 and (iii) 1999; and if he will make a statement. [120771]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 4 May 2000]: A total of 5,859 cases of tuberculosis were notified in England and Wales in 1997, 6,087 in 1998 and 6,144 in 1999. 3,232 cases were confirmed by culture in 1997 and 3,506 in 1998. Final totals for culture confirmed cases for 1999 are not yet available.

Of the culture confirmed cases, 32 were due to Mycobacterium bovis in 1997, and 29 in 1998. To date, 16 cases due to Mycobacterium bovis have been reported for 1999.

There is no evidence at present that the increase in bovine tuberculosis in cattle has led to an increase in bovine tuberculosis in the local human population.

The number of isolates of M. bovis from human cases of bovine tuberculosis in England and Wales has varied from 22 to 37 per year between 1993 and 1998 with no trend to increase or decrease. The numbers of human cases of M. bovis arising in those regions of England and Wales with the greatest increase in bovine tuberculosis in cattle (South West, Wales and West Midlands) have remained low and have also varied from year to year with no increasing or decreasing trend.

In response to the Krebs Committee report on tuberculosis in cattle and badgers, the Department undertook to continue to monitor the public health impact of M. bovis infection carefully. Measures have been taken to enhance surveillance, particularly in those areas most affected by infection in cattle, and to look at geographical and occupational variations in incidence. Department of Health and Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food officials hold regular meetings to keep matters under review with special regard to the potential for M. bovis to infect humans through the United Kingdom food chain and other zoonotic routes.

(Data from the Public Health Laboratory Service. Source: NOIDS database and Mycobnet database as at 3 May 2000 (database kept live)).

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if his Department routinely records the occupation of people identified as being infected with Bovine TB; and if he will make a statement. [120770]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 4 May 2000]: Information on the occupation of individuals notified with tuberculosis in England and Wales is sought on the standard notification form. This information is used locally.

Reports of M. bovis infections are collated by the Public Health Laboratory Service Communicable Disease Surveillance Centre as part of a scheme called the United Kingdom Mycobacterial Resistance Network (Mycobnet). On receipt of a report of M. bovis infection, a questionnaire is sent to the local Consultant in Communicable Disease Control (CCDC) inquiring, among other things, about whether the individual had an agricultural occupation (including working on a farm) or other animal contact.

Student Nurses

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what recent assessment he has made of the incidence of financial hardship among student nurses; and if he will make a statement; [120412]

(2) what representations he has received about the proposal to award employee status to student nurses; and if he will make a statement; [120406]

(3) what recent representations he has received regarding financial support for student nurses; and if he will make a statement. [120407]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 3 May 2000]: Information gathered by the National Health Service Executive's Regional Offices during 1999 reported a total of 105 payments to degree level students (less than 1 per cent. of the student population) from the NHS Hardship Fund. This year's review of student support arrangements will include examination of the provision made for those unfortunate enough to suffer hardship during their training and will encompass both degree and diploma students.

We are aware of the support among student nurses regarding the proposal to award them employee status. Indeed, this issue was discussed at a recent meeting with the Head of UNISON Health Group. However, the move away from students' status as employees accompanied improvements in nurse education, which moved training from the health service to higher education, and gave students supernumerary status thereby strengthening their educational experience. These changes were, and still are, supported by the Royal College of Nursing.

We want to ensure that as many nurses as possible complete their training and go on to work in the NHS, and we recognise the need, therefore, to provide student nurses with the support they need throughout their course. That is why the NHS Bursary Scheme continues to provide more generous support than that available to other students in higher education, and why bursary rates are being increased again by the rate of inflation from September—the third successive annual increase.

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list (a) the (i) executive agencies, (ii) non-departmental public bodies and (iii) local public spending bodies within his Department's remit, (b) the contractors employed by his Department and (c) the NHS bodies whose work (1) has been transferred since 1992 and (2) is planned to be transferred in the next 12 months (y) to and (z) from the Northern Region. Community Midwives

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to improve the pay and conditions of community midwives. [121068]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 5 May 2000]: The Review Body for Nursing Staff, Midwives, Health Visitors and Professions Allied to Medicine (NPRB) make recommendations on pay for community midwives employed on national terms and conditions. For the second year running, the Government have accepted in full the pay increases recommended by The Review Body for Nursing Staff, Midwives Health Visitors and Professions Allied to Medicine—an across the board increase of 3.4 per cent. for 2000–01, and for the second year running these increases will be paid in full without staging.

The Government's proposals for modernising the NHS pay system "Agenda for Change" were published last year. For nurses, midwives and health visitors this will mean a new career structure to replace outdated clinical grades, better career progression, fairer rewards for team working, developing new skills and taking on extended roles. The proposals are currently under negotiation with the unions and professional organisations.

Antidepressants

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he is taking to reduce deaths resulting from (a) Dothiepin and (b) other antidepressants. [120929]

Ms Stuart: The majority of deaths recorded in association with antidepressants are as a result of suicide. We take the issue of suicide very seriously. The development of strategies to reduce suicide and improve the mental well-being of the general population are a major part of our programme outlined in the White Paper—"Saving Lives: our Healthier Nation"—and in the National Service Framework for mental health.

Advice is given to health professionals in British National Formulary which advises that patients treated for depression should be assessed frequently for suicidal tendencies and that limited quantities of antidepressant drugs should be prescribed at any one time to reduce the risk of overdosage. The Summaries of Product Characteristics for antidepressants warn that patients at risk of suicide should be monitored closely. As with all medicines, the safety of antidepressants is continually monitored by the Medicines Control Agency and the independent expert advisory body, the Committee on Safety of Medicines.

NHS Trusts (London)

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the board members of each NHS trust in the London NHS region with responsibility for (a) corporate governance and (b) maintaining a register of interests for (i) all senior staff and (ii) consultants. [121203]

Mr. Denham: The information is not collected by the Department. However, it is commonly the board secretary who has responsibility for these issues.

Metered-dose Inhalers

Mr. Derek Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the cost to the NHS of migrating all recipient patients from metered dose inhalers to alternative pharmaceutical delivery systems. [120424]

Ms Stuart: No estimate has been made because such costs cannot be readily quantified.

Operating Theatres (Chemicals)

Mr. Derek Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussion he has had with safety experts and clinicians concerning the use of (a) ammonia and (b) hydrocarbons in hospital theatres. [120425]

Ms Stuart: The use of ammonia and hydrocarbons in hospitals is a matter for individual hospital trusts in conjunction with the Health and Safety Executive. All hospitals are required to undertake risk assessments under the Control of Substances Hazardous to Health regulations. This covers assessment of all potentially dangerous chemicals, including ammonia and hydrocarbons, in all hospital areas, including theatres.

Nurses

Dr. Fox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what the cost was of the television advertising campaign which described the average nurse as earning over £20,000 per year; [121128]

(2) what the average income is of a nurse, excluding allowances; [121129]

(3) what representations he has received regarding the television advertising campaign which described the average nurse as earning over £20,000 per year; [121130]

(4) who authorised the television advertisement stating that the average nurse earns over £20,000 per year; [121131]

(5) how his Department estimated the average income of a nurse for inclusion in the recent television advertising campaign; and if he will make a statement; [121132]

(6) if he will make a statement about the future of the television advertising campaign to recruit nurses. [121133]

Mr. Denham: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State authorised the recent nurse recruitment campaign which cost £4.2 million and was launched on 28 February, and included television advertising. The campaign will run for three years. The current campaign follows on from the success of last year's recruitment campaign. Over 45,000 people have inquired about a career in the National Health Service, or returning to the NHS, as a result of it.

Recruitment campaigns including local campaigns, are not a one-off exercise and we expect them to become a regular feature of what the NHS does. We will continue to review the success of television advertising and other ongoing activity to recruit and retain staff.

The original television advertisement stated "The average full-time qualified nurse earns over £20,000 per annum". This figure was drawn from the Department of Health annual earnings surveys, which show that from April 1999 gross average annual earnings for qualified nurses working full-time in the NHS were around £20,700.

This figure includes allowances paid for working unsocial hours, but excludes earnings from overtime, earnings for the more senior clinical H and I grades, and nurses in management posts. The average basic salary for all full-time qualified nursing staff, after implementation of the April 2000 pay award is £19,500. Unsocial hours payments bring average earnings for full-time qualified nurses to over £20,000.

Fewer than 20 people have made representations about the advertising campaign. We also received representations from the ITC about the television advertisement. Departmental officials met with the ITC. The ITC accepted our statement was factually correct. To reflect the increase in nurses' pay arising from the 2000–01 pay settlement the wording was changed. This wording was agreed with the ITC. The agreed working was: "From April (2000) average annual earnings for full-time qualified nurses are over £21,000, including allowances".

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Kosovo

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the role of the United Nations in Kosovo. [121067]

Mr. Vaz [holding answer 5 May 2000]: The United Nations Mission in Kosovo (UNMIK) has the unenviable task of reconstructing a devastated province and reconciling a polarised population. To this end UNMIK's operations have divided up under four pillars, covering civil administration, humanitarian relief, democratic institution-building and reconstruction.

We fully support UNMIK's efforts to carry out its mandate and have provided UK personnel to assist in local government, 60 civilian police officers with a further 90 promised and £119 million in humanitarian relief and reconstruction aid.

Sierra Leone

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the situation in Sierra Leone. [121299]

Mr. Hain: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary on 8 May 2000, Official Report, columns 518–29.

DEFENCE

Nuclear Test Veterans

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many claims for compensation by British nuclear test veterans have been (a) made and (b) settled to date. [121304]

Dr. Moonie: My Department has recorded 144 claims for compensation from British nuclear test veterans. As there is no evidence of excess illness or mortality among British nuclear test veterans as a group which could be linked to their participation in the nuclear tests, no compensation claims from them have been settled. In any event, prior to May 1987, Service personnel were prevented from pursuing claims for compensation from the Ministry of Defence by section 10 of The Crown Proceedings Act 1947. The repeal of section 10 by the Crown Proceedings (Armed Forces) Act 1987 was not made retrospective and claims arising from injury or illness caused before the repeal are barred by law.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Dr. Harold Shipman

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from hon. Members regarding an inquest on the 23 alleged victims of Dr Shipman; and if he is minded to direct the Stockport coroner to hold such an inquest. [121461]

Mr. Straw: No representations have been made to me on this matter other than from my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry). Having regard to all the issues, including the difficult position for the relatives if the deaths were not investigated in public, I have agreed that inquests should take place and directions have been sent to the coroner accordingly. The directions give the coroner authority to hold inquests. However, the detailed handling arrangements are matters for the coroner to determine.

Radio (Emergency Services)

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from (a) other Government Departments, (b) the Fire Service, (c) the Ambulance Service and (d) the Police concerning the Radio Replacement Scheme. [121336]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I have received various representations from police forces, the Association of Police Authorities, individual Police Authorities and other interested organisations in England and Wales about the Public Safety Radio Communications Project (PSRCP). The project represents an important part of our commitment to ensure that the police have access to the modern facilities they need to play their key part in tackling crime and disorder and improving community safety. Concern has been expressed about the cost of the project. I recognise those concerns. Over the three year period starting from the 1999–2000 financial year, the police service will receive an additional £1.24 billion in central Government funding. The annual charges for the PSRC Service will be reduced by the £50 million that I obtained from the Capital Modernisation Fund, specifically for the PSRCP. Consideration of the financial pressures on forces will also be taken into account in the overall level of resources to be provided to the police service in future years as part of the year 2000 Spending Review.

I have received, also, various representations from the fire services about future radio communications and control room requirements, including views on cost and on participation in the PSRC Service. All fire authorities in England and Wales are now required to undertake Best Value reviews of their communications requirements in 2000–01. I am making available to fire authorities this week the results of a consultancy study to assist consideration of their future control room needs. This strongly confirms the benefits of a joined-up approach in exploring technology to create new possibilities for improving cost-effectiveness and service delivery. This will be followed by guidance on take up of the PSRC Service.

The PSRC Service represents a positive approach to options to radio replacement programs within the Ambulance Services. The NHS Executive is reviewing this.

Chinese Head of State (Visit)

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the conduct of the Metropolitan police in relation to protesters during the Chinese Head of State's visit in 1999. [121298]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The policing arrangements for the State Visit of the President of China were fully reviewed by the Metropolitan police after the visit, and a copy of the review placed in the Library.

Since that time, the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis has accepted, in the context of court proceedings, that the removal of some flags and banners from protesters was unlawful.

EU Action Plan

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the role of Europol in co-operation with the Russian Federation authorities combating organised crime in the context of the EU Action Plan. [120851]

Mr. Charles Clarke: In its meeting on 27 March 2000, the Justice and Home Affairs Council approved the European Union Action Plan on common action for the Russian Federation on combating organised crime. In that meeting, the Council also adopted a Decision authorising the Director General of Europol to enter into negotiations on agreements with certain third states, including the Russian Federation, and non-European Union related bodies. The Government welcome this Council Decision which, in the context of the Action Plan, enables Europol to play a full part in supporting co-operation between the member states and the Russian Federation in combating the common threat from organised crime to mutual advantage.

Schengen Agreement

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on Government policy on acceding to elements of Schengen in lieu of a third state agreement, as set out in the Council Decision of 27 March, 2000/C106/01; what elements of information may not be shared under the latter agreement; and what assessment he has made of the additional benefits from direct partial accession. [120850]

Mrs. Roche: The United Kingdom Government have applied to participate in the law enforcement and judicial co-operation aspects of the Schengen acquis, including the Schengen Information System (SIS), in order to enhance co-operation at European Union level in the fight against organised and international crime.

The purpose of the Council Decision referred to is a limited one: it authorises the Director of Europol to enter into negotiations on agreements with third States and non-European Union related bodies. The United Kingdom is, of course, already a full member of Europol.

The Decision does not cover the broader police and judicial co-operation arrangements provided for in the Schengen Convention, nor the opportunity to participate in the SIS.

Europol and the SIS were established for entirely different purposes: the Europol Convention specifically excludes exchanges of information between the two databases. The Government's application to participate in parts of the Schengen acquis is complementary to its existing participation in Europol.

Magistrates Courts

Mr. Hurst: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the cost to the probation services in England and Wales consequent upon the closure of magistrates courts from 1 January 1995 to 31 December 1999. [121030]

Mr. Boateng: The information on which such estimates could be based is not held locally.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much his Department spent (i) directly and (ii) indirectly on asylum seekers in (a) 1995, (b) 1996, (c) 1997, (d) 1998 and (e) 1999; and what estimate has been made of expenditure in the year 2000. [119485]

Mr. Straw [holding answer 17 April 2000]: The following amounts have been directly spent on supporting asylum seekers. Expenditure is recorded by financial year and it is not possible to give figures for calendar years.

Direct Costs

£ million

Benefit	1995–96	1996–97	1997–98	1998–99	1999–2000
Home Office	—	—	—	—	537
Department of Social Security:
Income Support and Jobseeker's Allowance	205	195	150	150	[1]—
Housing Benefit	205	195	145	125	—
Council Tax Benefit	10	10	10	10	—
Department of Health:
Adults/Families	—	10	68	170	—
Children	—	3	2	20	52
Total (to nearest £ million)	420	413	375	475	590

[1] Home Office figures for 1999–2000 include the following amounts paid to the Department of Social Security for the cost of asylum support:
Income Support and Jobseeker's Allowance—£170 million
Housing Benefit—£135 million
Council Tax Benefit—£10 million
Note:
Figures may not sum due to rounding

The Department of Health did not incur costs of supporting asylum seekers before 1996–97, but from 1996–97 to 1998–99 was responsible for Special Grant payments to local authorities towards the cost of supporting asylum seekers. In 1999–2000, responsibility for grant payments for adult singles and families transferred to the Home Office, with responsibility for unaccompanied asylum-seeking children remaining with the Department of Health.

The Home Office also incurs other costs of dealing with asylum seekers, but these cannot be separated from the overall costs of the Immigration and Nationality Directorate. The following table shows the annual outturn for Immigration and Nationality Directorate, which includes the cost of dealing with asylum seekers. The budgeted amount for 2000–01 has yet to be confirmed.

Indirect Costs

£ million

Year	Amount spent
1995–96	199
1996–97	212
1997–98	215
1998–99	209
1999–2000	[1]260

[1] Forecast outturn

The Lord Chancellor's Department also incurs costs in dealing with asylum seekers, but these cannot be separated from the overall running costs of the Immigration Appellate Authority. The following table provides administration costs of the Immigration Appellate Authority, which includes the costs of dealing with asylum seekers but excludes accommodation recruitment and other capital expenses. The budget for 2000–01 has yet to be confirmed.

£ million

Year	Amount spent
1995–96	8.4
1996–97	11.4
1997–98	12.5
1998–99	14.1
1999–2000	16.1

The Department of Social Security estimates that between 1994 and 1999 the annual administrative cost for income support asylum seeker claims was in the region of £1 million. In 1999–2000, the estimated cost is in the region of £2 million.

The Department of Health is unable to quantify the indirect cost of asylum seekers as no data are collected for analysis.

The Department for Education and Employment does not collect information centrally about education, training or employment provision for asylum seekers or their dependants and cannot supply costs spent directly or indirectly from 1995.

The Department for the Environment, Transport and the Regions has no programme of expenditure on asylum seekers and indirect expenditure is not separately identifiable.

The number of asylum seekers in Northern Ireland is extremely small and any expenditure is, therefore, negligible.

TREASURY

Employment Tax Credits

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 19 April 2000, Official Report, column 588W, on employment tax credits, what is the higher rate for couples. [120799]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 4 May 2000]: The rate for couples in the illustrative model of the employment tax credit for people without children is £49.50 a week. This is the same as the employment tax credit for people with children that is implied by the introduction of the integrated child credit, based on April 2001 rates of Working Families Tax Credit and Children's Tax Credit. Details of this illustrative model are set out in the table on page 14 of the Treasury paper "Tackling Poverty and Making Work Pay—Tax Credits for the 21st Century".

Tax (EU)

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proposals are under negotiation in the EU for (a) Europe-wide taxes and (b) European limits and controls on national taxes. [120809]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 5 May 2000]: EC proposals for legislation are considered by the European Scrutiny Committee and Explanatory Memoranda concerning existing proposals on taxation are in the Library.

EU-UK Trade

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of United Kingdom exports and imports counted as being within the EU, consists of entrepot trade through Rotterdam and Amsterdam (a) to and (b) from non-EU countries. [120810]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 5 May 2000]: HM Customs and Excise are the Department responsible for collecting trade statistics on the movement of goods with other countries including EC member states.

Goods from non-EC destinations that transit other EC member states before clearing customs procedures for import in UK are recorded as non-EC movements for trade statistics purposes. Likewise, goods from non-EC destinations that transit other EC member states after clearing customs procedures for export in UK are recorded as non-EC movements.

Some trade reported as moving within the EC may have previously originated from, or be ultimately destined for, non-EC countries. However, under the Intrastat system these movements are not readily identifiable.

UK Companies Overseas (Bribes)

Dr. Cable: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps the Inland Revenue takes to ensure that bribes paid by UK companies overseas are not treated as tax-deductible expenses. [121032]

Dawn Primarolo: Section 577A, Income and Corporation Taxes Act (ICTA) 1988 denies tax relief for any payment the making of which constitutes the commission of a criminal offence.

This effectively denies relief, inter alia, for any bribe which is contrary to the Prevention of Corruption Acts. There is also a general provision (section 577 ICTA) which denies tax relief for any form of business entertainment, hospitality or gift—so some payments which might be in a grey area might in any event be denied relief without the need to show that they were in any way corrupt payments.

As far as enforcement is concerned, the Inland Revenue examines a proportion of tax returns every year, to ensure that taxpayers pay the correct amount of tax. Most of the returns that are examined in detail are selected after a risk assessment, which identifies those cases where errors are most likely, and where the amount at stake is greatest. Tax inspectors are trained to discover evasion, avoidance and technical errors, by establishing the full facts and applying the correct interpretation of tax law. As part of this process they will, where appropriate, make inquiries about claims for expenditure, to ensure that they are allowed under tax law.

Children's Fund (Wales)

Ms Julie Morgan: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to distribute money from the Children's Fund in Wales; and what mechanisms will be used to distribute the fund. [119579]

Dawn Primarolo: The Children's Fund will be used to support voluntary sector projects providing local solutions to the problem of child poverty. These are devolved matters. Work on mechanisms for distributing money is currently focusing on England, but involves dialogue with the devolved administrations.

The question of resources for the Children's Fund, including any consequentials for the devolved administrations, is being considered as part of the current Spending Review. In the event of spending consequentials it would be for the Welsh Assembly to decide whether and how to establish a Children's Fund for Wales.

HEALTH

Smokers Helpline

Siobhain McDonagh: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many calls were made to the new helpline for smokers between 10 December 1999 and 11 February 2000. [113837]

Yvette Cooper 70,480 calls were answered by the frontscreen service in the specified period. This includes hang-ups, hoaxes and trials, but does not include short-calls lost in the British Telecom system.

Siobhain McDonagh: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what has been the total expenditure on advertising the new helpline for smokers in the current year. [113838]

Yvette Cooper: The total sum of advertising spend on the new tobacco education campaign for the period 10 December 1999—31 March 2000 inclusive was £5,485,000. The breakdown is as follows:

Ambient media	141,000
Billboards	1,242,000
TV	3,190,000
Press	397,000
Radio	515,000

The aim of the new campaign is to increase the intention to give up, provide support and encouragement for those who want to give up by communicating that many smokers want to give up and that they are not alone; that giving up is an ongoing and difficult process and that individual support is available in local areas and through the helpline.

Siobhain McDonagh: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of calls to the new helpline for smokers were answered by an automated system (IVR) during the period 10 December 1999 and 11 February 2000. [113839]

Yvette Cooper: During the specified period 40 per cent. of calls were answered by the IVR system and 60 per cent. were answered by live operators.

During the exceptional Millennium period (27 December 1999 to 3 January 2000) 58 per cent. of calls went to IVR and the rest to live operators.

If these exceptionally high figures for the Millennium period are taken out of the totals the proportion of IVR to live would be 26 per cent. IVR to 74 per cent. live for 10 December 1999 to 11 February 2000.

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the total expenditure was on advertising the new helpline for smokers, between 10 December 1999 and the end of March 2000; and what the expenditure on the Quitline was for the equivalent period in the previous year. [115395]

Yvette Cooper: The total sum of advertising spend on the new tobacco education campaign for the period 10 December 1999 and up until the end of March 2000 is £5,485,000. The breakdown is as follows:

Ambient media[1]	141,000
Billboards	1,242,000
TV	3,190,000
Press	397,000
Radio	515,000

[1]The term Ambient media is defined as non-traditional, outdoor media.

The total advertising spend for 1998–99 was £2,720,000, most of the campaign activity being concentrated in the December 1998 to February 1999 period.

The aim of the new campaign is to increase the intention to give up, provide support and encouragement for those who want to give up by communicating that many smokers want to give up and that they are not alone; that giving up is an on-going and difficult process and that individual support is available in local areas and through the helpline.

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of calls to the new helpline for smokers were answered by an automated system (IVR) during the period 10 December 1999 to 11 March 2000 inclusive; and what was the proportion for calls to Quitline for the equivalent period in the previous year. [115394]

Yvette Cooper: 35 per cent. of calls were answered by the IVR system in the specified period. The proportion of calls reaching the automated Quitline service in the equivalent period in 1998–99 was 26 per cent.

If the exceptionally high figures for the Millennium period (27 December 1999 to 3 January 2000) are taken out of the totals the proportion of calls answered by IVR was 22 per cent.

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many calls were made to the new helpline for smokers, between 10 December 1999 and 11 March 2000 inclusive; and how many calls were made to the Quitline, in the same period for the previous year. [115396]

Yvette Cooper: The 1999–2000 campaign was designed to motivate smokers towards a range of cessation options such as 'going it alone', seeking advice from a general practitioner or pharmacist or visiting a local cessation service, as well as telephoning the helpline or visiting the new campaign website.

Calls to the helplines funded by the Department were as follows:

10 December 1999 to 11 March 2000
0800 169 0 169: 83,451 (calls answered)
0800 00 22 00: 75,431 (calls answered)
Total: 158,882.

In addition, there were 231,891 hits to the website in that period.

10 December 1998 to 11 March 1999
175,827 calls were made to Quitline: 0800 00 22 00.

Griffiths Inquiry

Dr. Brand: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the report of the independent inquiry into clinical trials in North Staffordshire, prepared last year by a panel chaired by Professor R. K. Griffiths, will be published. [120306]

Mr. Denham: The review of the research framework in North Staffordshire was published on 8 May 2000.

Rheumatoid Arthritis

Mr. Woolas: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to make Etanercept available on the NHS for treatment of rheumatoid arthritis. [120655]

Ms Stuart: Etanercept will be available on the National Health Service as soon as the manufacturer launches the product in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will have completed the licensing process for the use of Remicade in rheumatoid arthritis; and if he will be referring this to the National Institute for Clinical Excellence. [120831]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 8 May 2000]: Remicade has been authorised for the treatment of Crohn's disease. The authorisation was obtained through the European Centralised Procedure which is co-ordinated by the European Medicines Evaluation Agency. If the marketing authorisation holder applies for a new clinical indication for the treatment of rheumatoid arthritis, the Committee for Proprietary Medicinal Products at the European Medicines Evaluation Agency will review the available data and transmit its scientific opinion to the European Commission. European marketing authorisations are published in the form of a commission Decision in the official Journal of the European Communities. Presently, remicade does not form part of the National Institute for Clinical Excellence's (NICE) work programme for this year. However, NICE's work programme is continually being re-assessed and a number of possible additional topics for appraisal by NICE during the year 2000–01 are currently being considered. An announcement will be made shortly.

Committee for Proprietary Medicinal Products

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what reports he has received of the commercial interests of the members of the Committee for Proprietary Medicinal Products. [121107]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 8 May 2000]: The Committee for Proprietary Medicinal Products is a European committee for which I have no responsibility. I cannot, therefore, answer this question.

Committee on Safety of Medicines

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make inquiries concerning the commercial interests of all members of the Committee on Safety of Medicines; and if he will publish the results of those inquiries. [121106]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 8 May 2000]: The commercial interests of all members of the Medicines Act Advisory Bodies, of which the Committee on Safety of Medicines (CSM) is one, are published annually in the "Medicines Act 1968 Advisory Bodies—Annual Reports", copies of which are available in the Library. The 1999 report is due to be published in July this year. The latest record of CSM interests in the pharmaceutical industry—correct at 5 May 2000—has been placed in the Library.

Ozone-friendly Refrigerants

Mr. Derek Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what his policy is on the use of ozone-friendly refrigerants in air conditioning in NHS premises; in and what guidance is given on this in respect of purchasing new equipment. [120417]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 8 May 2000]: It is the Department's policy to achieve best environmental practice and it is committed to the efficient use of energy and resources. This includes taking action to reduce/minimise pollution, or the risk of pollution, including ozone-depleting substances and greenhouse gases.

National Health Service Estates—an executive agency of the Department—issued guidance "Model Engineering Specifications" that includes design notes C4, "Mechanical Ventilation and Air Conditioning Systems" and C10, "Refrigeration". This guides NHS bodies and encourages designers to use ozone-friendly refrigerants. NHS bodies are advised to take these matters into account when making their purchasing decisions.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Coal Industry (BBC)

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information about his decision to pay subsidies to the coal industry was given to the BBC by (a) Ministers, (b) special advisers and (c) officials in his Department before Monday 17 April. [121050]

Mr. Byers: The Department maintains regular contact with the BBC on a range of issues.

Staff Redeployment

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the reasons for the recent redeployment from his Department's energy policy division of (a) Mr. Mike Atkinson, (b) Mr. Michael Orig, (c) Mr. Alan Wright and (d) Mr. Jonathan Green. [121047]

Mrs. Liddell: As is normal practice these moves were decided under the authority of the Permanent Secretary, as part of the Department's career management processes.

Minimum Wage

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many prosecutions there have been to date for the non-payment by a company to their workforce of the national minimum wage. [121123]

Mr. Alan Johnson [holding answer 5 May 2000]: There have been no criminal prosecutions under section 31 of the National Minimum Wage Act 1999 since it came into force 13 months ago.

This is because the Act also contains a number of provisions empowering enforcement officers to take civil action against non-paying employers and the enforcement body will always use these in the first instance. However, there will be criminal prosecutions where the enforcement body considers them necessary.

Spirometry Testing

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many test centres have been established for claimants for compensation for chronic bronchitis and emphysema; where they are; and when he expects all planned test centres to be in operation. [120400]

Mrs. Liddell: Spirometry testing has been conducted at 36 centres at Barnsley, Blackpool, Bolsover, Bristol, Cannock, Cardiff, Chesterfield, Coventry, Deal, Durham, Drongon, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Hessle, Huddersfield, Leeds, Leicester, Lochore, Mansfield, Mexborough, Mountain Ash, Newcastle, Newport, Nottingham, Oxford, Pontefract, Plymouth, Salford, Sheffield, South Rislip, Stoke, Swansea, Whitehaven, Wigan, Wirral and Wrexham. In addition to the 46,000 or so spirometry assessments carried at these centres, the Department has also assessed over 3,000 claimants in their homes.

The centres in Barnsley, Bristol, Cannock, Chesterfield, Coventry, Durham, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Huddersfield, Leeds, Lochore, Mansfield, Mexborough, Mountain Ash, Newcastle, Newport, Nottingham, Pontefract, Sheffield, Stoke, Swansea, Wigan and Wrexham have now been fully adapted for the more detailed medical requirements of the main Medical Assessment Process (MAP). There are also new cantres in Ayr, Enfield and Manchester. In addition the spirometry centre in Deal will be adapted shortly. The need for further centres will be kept under review.

Coal

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list in respect of (a) deep-mined and (b) open-cast coal the tonnages of coal produced in the latest year for which figures are available for each member state of the European Union, together with the amounts of subsidy provided; and if he will list the relevant articles of European Union treaties and relevant regulations or directives relating to limits on non-commercial support for the mining or marketing of coal. [120645]

Mrs. Liddell: I have no information on the division between deep-mined coal and opencast coal produced in other member states. Total hard coal production in the EU in 1999 was as follows:

Germany 44 million tonnes, UK 36 million tonnes (21 million deep-mined and 15 million opencast), Spain 17 million tonnes and France 4.5 million tonnes.

The last year for which figures are available for the amount of subsidy provided is 1997. In that year Germany produced 51 million tonnes with authorised operating aid of ECU 4,919.1 million. The UK produced 47 million tonnes (30.3 million deep-mined and 16.7 million open cast) with no operating aid. Spain produced 17.5 million tonnes with authorised operating aid of ECU 704.5 million. France produced 5 million tonnes of hard coal in 1997, but we have no information on the amount of operating aid paid.

Issues relating to the production of coal are covered by the Treaty establishing the European Coal and Steel Community, which is also known as the Treaty of Paris. State aid is prohibited in general terms by Article 4 of that Treaty but Decision 3632/93/ECSC, which is made under Article 95, permits such aid in the limited circumstances detailed in the Decision which include prior Commission approval.

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will provide an analysis of how the figure for state aid for the coal industry was derived. [120111]

Mrs. Liddell: As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry indicated in his statement to the House on 17 April 2000, Official Report, columns 697–99, the Government are exploring with the European Commission how state aid might be offered to help the coal industry through this period of transition. We will also be consulting with interested parties on the precise structure of the state aid scheme to be put to the European Commission.

The amount of aid paid will depend on the outcome of negotiations with the Commission and coal producers as well as market conditions over the next two years. It is too soon to make any detailed analysis of the costs. I have said that I do not rule out a figure as high as £100 million.

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the occasions on which he has discussed with the European Commission the potential for state aid to the coal industry. [120114]

Mrs. Liddell: I have discussed the potential for state aid to the coal industry with Commissioner de Palacio. Officials in London and Brussels have discussed the issue with the Commission services. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has discussed the matter with Commissioner Monti.

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which interested parties he will be consulting regarding the proposed state aid to the coal industry; and by when the consultation process will be completed. [120112]

Mrs. Liddell: My officials will discuss the proposed state aid to the coal industry with major coal producers and coal production trade associations, as well as coal users and traders. This informal consultation process will take place during May this year. Any interested parties should contact David Fielder on 020 7215 5593 or write to the Coal Directorate at Room UG23, 1 Victoria Street, London, SW1H 0ET. We will, of course, also be consulting the European Commission prior to submitting a formal notification of aid.

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects the European Commission to reach a decision on the legality of the proposed state aid to the coal industry. [120113]

Mrs. Liddell: The Government will be discussing a proposed state aid scheme for the coal industry with the European Commission and the coal industry over coming weeks. The Commission has three months from the date on which we submit a formal notification of aid in which to reach a decision. As was said to the House on 17 April 2000, Official Report, columns 697–99, we hope to be making the first payments under the scheme during this financial year.

Regulations

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he plans to adopt the Better Regulation Task Force recommendation of a minimum of three months consultation before regulations are laid before Parliament. [121338]

Mr. Byers: We are presently considering the Task Force's recommendations.

Part-time Work Directive

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he will publish guidance on the part-time work directive. [121331]

Mr. Byers: Guidance on the part-time work directive has already been published.

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to widen the scope of the part-time work directive. [121330]

Mr. Byers: Our proposals were laid before Parliament on 3 May and we have no plans to widen their scope.

Fixed-term Contracts

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he plans to consult on fixed-term contracts. [121332]

Mr. Byers: The fixed-term work directive was agreed on 28 June 1999 and is due to be implemented in the UK by 10 July 2001. The Government plan to consult on their proposals in order to meet this deadline.

Small Business Council

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will list the business qualifications and experience required for the post of Chairman of the Small Business Council; [121334]

(2) if he will set out the job specification for the Chairman of the Small Business Council. [121335]

Mr. Byers: I refer to the DTI news release of 7 March in which my hon. Friend the Minister of State for Small Business and E-Commerce announced the appointment of William Sargent as the first Chair of the Small Business Council and made clear that his experience makes him well suited for the post.

BNFL

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what communications he received about the BNFL Safety Action Plan between 18 February and 18 April from British Nuclear Fuels. [120042]

Mrs. Liddell: I did not receive communications from BNFL on their proposed responses to the HSE reports between 18 February and 18 April.

Dr. Jack Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what appointments of non-executive directors to the Board of British Nuclear Fuels Limited have not been made under the terms of the Code and Guidance of the Commissioner for Public Appointments; and if he will make a statement. [115995]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 27 March 2000]: I refer my right hon. Friend to the answer I gave to him on 20 March 2000, Official Report, column 412W. I am advised that there is one matter concerning the change of status from executive to non-executive director of one director, currently on a short-term appointment, about which my officials are in contact with the Office of the Commissioner of Public Appointments. Unrelated to that matter, however, the company has announced that the director concerned will be leaving the Board at the end of August upon expiry of the term of his appointment.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Magistrates Courts

Mr. Hurst: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement on the costs of administering the magistrates courts in England and Wales in each year from 1995 to 1999. [R] [121024]

Jane Kennedy: The gross revenue costs of administering the magistrates courts are as follows:

Year	£ million
1995–96	330
1996–97	330
1997–98	325
1998–99	328

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Aid

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what plans she has to assess the effectiveness of provision of long-term development aid channelled through non-governmental organisations to countries in conflict. [120764]

Mr. Foulkes: None.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

"Ingredients for Success"

Mr. Robert Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list those who responded to the consultation exercise, "Ingredients for Success". [119464]

Jacqui Smith [holding answer 20 April 2000]: We received and took into account 181 representations in response to "Ingredients for Success". About a quarter of the responses came from nutritionists, about a fifth from local education authorities, and about a further fifth from representative and professional bodies. The remainder came from caterers, school staff, food manufacturers and suppliers, and others (charities and individuals). I will write to the hon. Member with a summary of responses, together with a list of those who responded.

Correspondence

Mr. McLoughlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when the hon. Member for West Derbyshire can expect to receive a reply to the letter he sent on 21 February about Meadows Primary School. [120679]

Ms Hodge: A reply was sent to the hon. Member on 27 March 2000.

Specialist Staff

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the provision of specialist staff through Ethnic Minority and Travellers Educational Achievement Grant funding. [121253]

Jacqui Smith: The Ethnic Minority and Traveller Achievement Grant (EMTAG) is designed to raise standards for those ethnic minority and traveller pupils at risk of under-achieving and to meet the particular needs of pupils for whom English is an additional language.

We are making available more money than ever before as part of our drive to raise the academic achievements of those ethnic minority groups at risk of under-achieving. For 2000–01, £162.5 million will be available to local education authorities and schools to improve the attainment of ethnic minority, traveller and refugee pupils—an increase of 7 per cent. on the amount available for these purposes in 1999–2000.

A key element of the grant programme is that the funding should largely go direct to schools, so that head teachers can use it where it is most needed—to employ more teachers and teaching assistants and to work with their local communities. Specialist teachers, bilingual assistants and other classroom assistants supported through the grant have a vital role to play in raising standards for ethnic minority pupils. We expect that, depending on local needs, a large proportion of the grant will be spent on teachers and classroom assistants. As a requirement of the grant, local education authorities are required to provide information about their plans for spending the grant and details of actual expenditure. We will also monitor the numbers of specialist staff employed by EMTAG through an independent evaluation of the grant.

Computers for Teachers Initiative

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many teachers have received computers as a result of his Computers for Teachers initiative. [121252]

Mr. Wills: The deadline for teachers' purchase of computers under this scheme was 30 April 2000. To date, some 15,000 applications for subsidy have been received following purchase of computers by teachers. These are being processed, and more are expected. A final figure will be published later this year.

Grant-maintained Schools

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to his answer of 2 May 2000, Official Report, column 92W, what was the pupil:teacher ratio in (a) former grant-maintained primary schools and (b) former grant-maintained secondary schools in each of the last five years. [121270]

Ms Estelle Morris: The available information on pupil:teacher ratios in maintained primary and secondary schools is shown in the following table.

The Department is currently collecting information on pupil:teacher ratios in all schools for January 2000. Provisional national estimates for maintained nursery, primary and secondary schools were published in Statistical First Release "Pupil: Teacher ratios in maintained schools in England (14/2000)" on 12 April 2000, a copy of which is available from the Library. Final data will be published in a statistical volume in September.

[2] Includes all full-time pupils and full-time equivalent of part time pupils (each part-time pupil is treated as 0.5 full-time equivalents).
[3] Includes all full-time qualified teachers and full-time equivalent of part time qualified teachers (the directed hours of part-time teachers are converted to full-time equivalent teacher numbers by dividing by 32.5)

Key Stage 2

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what reliability data are available for the end of Key Stage 2 tests; and for what reason they are not published. [121091]

Ms Estelle Morris: It is unclear what reliability data are referred to in this question.

Test reliability relates to how a test question is answered by children or pupils and how consistently it is interpreted in the way anticipated. This aspect of the test question performance is dealt with by means of pre-testing the questions—a process which occurs twice during the life-cycle of a test question. The Government are satisfied that the quality control procedures for the test development and the marking process is thorough and rigorous. This was reflected in the findings of the Rose Review, an independent cross-party panel set up last year to consider the test development and assessment arrangements at Key Stage 2. The data are not published as they form part of the overall process of judging how well a question performs—which takes into account other, judgmental factors.

Reliability in marking relates to the construction of the mark scheme and how markers interpret the answers to questions. Absolute reliability is achieved when any marker, trained in the use of a markscheme, marks a question and gives it the same mark as any other marker who may mark the same question. Marker training is intended to ensure that marker reliability is as high as possible. Data are collected from markers and analysed each year in relation to the degree of variation from absolute reliability which occurs. The data are used to manage the marking process and remove any markers which may not be performing satisfactorily. As the data relates to individual teachers, they remain confidential.

The Qualifications and Curriculum Authority publish the findings from their annual evaluation of the test administration procedure.

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many end of Key Stage 2 English test papers were returned for a review of marking in each of the past four years. [121089]

Ms Estelle Morris: Data are available only for the past three years:

1999: 4,974
1998: 4,095
1997: 1,881.

Bearing in mind the cohort sizes of approximately 600,000 pupils, these figures represent a very small percentage.

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many end of Key Stage 2 English test papers were returned for a review of marking last year; and what proportion of these resulted in a change of National Curriculum level. [121088]

Ms Estelle Morris: In 1999, 4,974 end of Key Stage 2 English papers were returned for a review of marking. This figure represents approximately 0.8 per cent. of the total number of English papers taken nationally.

45 per cent. of these reviews resulted in a change of National Curriculum level.

Age Discrimination

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to ensure that his Department avoids operating policies which result in age discrimination. [121087]

Ms Hodge: We are committed to eliminating age discrimination from the Department's policies and practices in line with the "Code of Practice on Age Diversity in Employment", published in June 1999. We are conducting a full review of all our personnel procedures to ensure they are consistent with the standards set out in the code.

In addition, in line with our commitments to equality of opportunity, the Department already recruits and promotes people on the basis of their competence to do the job without reference to their age through full fair and open competitions; encourages all staff to take advantage of learning and development opportunities; and has given its staff greater flexibility to choose when they retire between the ages of 60 and 65.

As part of the Department's commitment to continuous improvement, we are currently carrying out a review of the way we ensure that equal opportunities issues, including age, are taken into account in the development of all our policies.

GCSE Courses

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to abolish the agricultural, horticultural and nautical studies GCSE courses offered by the NEAB. [121086]

Mr. Wicks: The Qualifications and Curriculum Authority (QCA) is currently working with the awarding bodies to develop advice on the list of approved GCSE titles to be offered from 2001. QCA is seeking the views of interested organisations before submitting final recommendations. No decisions have been reached at this stage. There is a wide range of vocationally-related qualifications in agriculture and horticulture already available, including GNVQs in land and environment. We shall ensure that there continues to be an appropriate range of qualifications in all three areas in the future for young people.

Post-16 Education

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the staying-on rate for post-16 years education in respect of pupils from schools (a) with and (b) without sixth forms in each of the last five years. [120917]

Mr. Wicks: The Department does not collect administrative data on 16-year-olds in education by the type of school attended the previous year. However, estimates of the proportion of 16-year-olds in full-time education in the Spring following Year 11, with a breakdown by school type, are available from the Youth Cohort Study. Estimates for the latest years are given in the following table.

Proportion of 16-year-olds in full-time education [1] in maintained schools at Year 11, England

Percentage

	1994	1996	1998
School without sixth form	64	65	62
School with sixth form	73	73	71

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he will publish the latest updated timetable for the transition plan for changes in delivery of post-16 years education. [120829]

Mr. Wicks [holding answer 8 May 2000]: We have been working with partner organisations to update the National Transition Plan. The next version will reflect important announcements we made at the end of March on handling the staffing implications of "Learning to Succeed" and the second Funding Consultation Documents which are being issued this week. We intend to publish the next version of the Transition Plan within the next month.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the 10 local education authorities with (a) the highest and (b) the lowest rate of pupils staying on for post-16 years education. [120918]

Mr. Wicks: We are committed to a step change in participation and attainment rates for 16 and 17-year-olds. The Learning and Skills Bill sets out reforms in post-16 education and training which we believe will make a significant impact. We have announced details of the new Connexions Service which will provide advice, guidance, information and support service for all 13 to 19-year-olds, whatever their needs and circumstances. Five Connexions Service pilots were announced on 3 February 2000 evaluating various aspects of the new service.

The information requested on participation in education by LEA is contained in the following table. There are no data available on participation in Government Supported Training by LEA but there is evidence that higher rates of training by TEC areas compensate for low levels of full-time education.

A-levels

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what proportion of candidates aged 18 years or under achieved three or more grade As at A-level in (a) sixth forms in independent schools, (b) sixth forms in maintained schools, (c) sixth form colleges and (d) other further education colleges in the most recent year for which figures are available; [120913]

(2) what was the total average points score for candidates aged 18 years or under attempting at least one GCE A-level from (a) school sixth forms in the maintained and independent sectors, (b) sixth form colleges and (c) other further education colleges in the last year for which figures are available. [120919]

Mr. Wicks: The proportion of candidates aged 18 years or under that achieved three or more grade As at A-level in England in 1998–99 was:

(a) 17 per cent. in sixth forms in independent schools

(b) 6 per cent. in sixth forms in maintained schools

(c) 5 per cent. in sixth form colleges

(d) 2 per cent. in other further education colleges.

The total average points score for candidates aged 18 or under attempting at least one GCE A-level in England in 1998–99 was:

(a) 17.9 in school sixth forms in the maintained and independent sectors—22.1 for independent schools and 16.6 for maintained schools

(b) 16.3 in sixth form colleges

(c) 9.7 in other further education colleges.

League Cricket

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will meet representatives of the Lancashire Cricket Board to discuss the regulations relating to the employment of overseas professionals in league cricket. [121266]

Ms Hodge: Due to diary commitments, I am unable to meet representatives from the Board. I have arranged for representatives from the Department's Overseas Labour Service to contact the Board to discuss their concerns.

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what representations he has received on the employment of overseas professionals in league cricket; and if he will make a statement. [121265]

Ms Hodge: I have received a number of letters from Members of Parliament whose constituencies are in Lancashire. The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State with responsibility for work permit matters and I have given detailed replies explaining the current criteria for the employment of overseas cricketers which were agreed after consultation with the cricketing governing bodies who are responsible for the development of the game in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what regulations have been introduced in the past five years which change the existing arrangements whereby overseas professionals can be employed in league cricket; and if he will make a statement. [121264]

Ms Hodge: In 1993 criteria were introduced which required an overseas cricketer to have played in at least one first class match, as defined by the International Cricket Council (ICC), to qualify for issue of a work permit to play in league cricket.

This requirement remained until August 1998 when, after consultations with the English and Wales Cricket Board, the Scottish Cricket Union, and representatives of the League Cricket Conference, the criteria were changed. In order to qualify for a permit a player must have played in a minimum of one test match for his country, or at least three one-day internationals, or at least five first class matches, as defined by the ICC. It was also decided that discretion would be exercised when considering applications for former test match players who did not meet this criteria.

Work permit arrangements for cricket players are reviewed annually between the Department's Overseas Labour Service and the relevant cricket governing bodies.

Gifted Children

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what progress has been made with plans for gifted children to sit maths GCSE early under the Maths 2000 project. [121251]

Ms Estelle Morris: The National Primary Trust is developing Advanced Maths Centres to enable gifted pupils to take GCSE Mathematics in Year 6, following an out of school hours learning programme. The Trust is currently negotiating with 23 Excellence in Cities partnerships with a view to establishing 10 to 15 centres. Each would cater initially for up to 40 pupils from schools within Excellence in Cities areas. This initial cohort would take GCSE examinations in Summer 2001.

Deaf and Blind Children

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what additional resources, following the recent Budget, he has allocated to local education authorities to support peripatetic teachers of the deaf and blind who support children in mainstream classes. [121329]

Ms Estelle Morris: All schools will be free to use the £290 million extra funding announced in the budget as they see fit. It will therefore be open to them to allocate some of the extra funding to employ peripatetic teachers of the deaf and blind, where they have children who would benefit from such support. Funding is also available under Standards Fund grant 18 to support the training and development of teachers of deaf and blind pupils.

"News Update"

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the cost of (a) preparation, publication and printing and (b) postage and distribution of "News Update" from his Department; how many copies have been printed; and to whom they have been distributed, in each year since it commenced publication. [121327]

Mr. Wicks: "News Update" is produced five times a year. Production costs on average £1,300 per issue, including printing. The print run is 3,500 per issue. Since the first issue in November 1998, the total production costs have been £11,700.

"News Update" is distributed to MPs, opposition front-bench spokespersons in the House of Lords, Local Education Authority Chairs and Chief Executives, Trade Union General Secretaries, TEC Chief Executives and internally to senior staff at the DfEE and the Employment Service. Much of the distribution is through the DfEE's internal mail network without quantifiable cost. External postage amounts to about £80 per issue.

Higher Education

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what institutions are currently designated under section 28 of the Further and Higher Education Act 1992; and which of these have (a) been designated and (b) have had their designation withdrawn during the last three years. [120830]

Mr. Wicks [holding answer 8 May 2000]: There are currently 32 designated colleges under section 28 of the Further and Higher Education Act 1992. Of these, 19 are designated under subsection 28(2)(a) as former voluntary aided schools and the remaining 13 colleges were designated under subsections 28(2)(b) and 28(2)(c) and are generally referred to as "specialist designated".

There have been no new designations since the establishment of the FE sector on 1 April 1993. Three designated colleges have merged since then with other colleges: St. Phillip's Roman Catholic Sixth Form College (now part of South Birmingham College) on 31 August 1995; National Sea Training College (now part of North West Kent College of Technology) on 25 October 1996; and De La Salle College (now part of Pendleton College) on 7 February 1997.

The full list of designated colleges is as follows:

Aquinas College, Stockport

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many extra full-time places in higher education have been created in each of the last five years. [120834]

Mr. Wicks [holding answer 8 May 2000]: The available information is given in the table. Plans which distinguish between full and part-time places are available only from the academic year 1999–2000.

Publicly funded higher education places in England [1]

1994–95	941	—
1995–96	961	20
1996–97	1,003	[2]43
1997–98	1,001	(2)
1998–99	1,023	22
1999–2000	1,035	12

[1] Includes full and part-time, undergraduate and postgraduate students on the basis of full-time equivalents (FTEs). Places shown are those funded through the Higher Education Funding Council for England (HEFCE) or the Teacher Training Agency (TTA), and exclude those in further education colleges funded by the Further Education Funding Council (FEFC).

[2] 1996 plans included an additional 28,000 mainstreamed continuing education places, which had previously not been funded.

Pupil Subsidies (Hardship)

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the cost of (a) free school meals and (b) clothing grants and other subsidies for children attending maintained schools in (i) 1970, (ii) 1980 and (iii) 1999; and if he will estimate how many children in receipt of such benefits came from broken homes. [119771]

Jacqui Smith: The Department does not collect this information. However, using data on school meals take-up, we estimate that the cost of providing free school meals in England in the 1999–2000 financial year was over £300 million. The Department did not collect statistics on the take-up of free school meals before 1989, so we cannot estimate their cost in 1970 and 1980. Under education legislation, local education authorities and schools must offer free school meals to those pupils whose parents receive income support or income-based Jobseeker's Allowance. We do not collect data on the numbers of eligible pupils from broken homes.

Local education authorities have discretionary powers to offer clothing grants and other miscellaneous subsidies to children in cases of hardship. It is for each authority to set its own eligibility criteria for grant, in the light of local needs and circumstances. The Department does not collect data on these grants.

Performance and Assessment

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the recent research by David Jesson of the Centre for Performance Evaluation and Resource Management at the University of York; and if he will make a statement. [119922]

Jacqui Smith: An analysis by the Department's Analytical Services has shown that, broadly speaking on average points scores, the most able 25 per cent. of pupils achieved the same result in selective and non-selective schools.

David Jesson's research is a further contribution to this debate.

Special Schools

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many (a) primary and (b) secondary special schools have closed since 1995 in each local education authority. [119539]

Jacqui Smith [holding answer 17 April 2000]: The table sets out the number of maintained special schools which have closed in each local education authority area since 1995. It does not include those authorities where no such closures have taken place. It includes closures which have been approved but which have not yet taken place. But the closure of some special schools is usually followed by the opening of others, or by the establishing of special units within mainstream schools.

While there are some special schools which cater for pupils wholly of primary school age, or wholly of secondary school age, there are many others which cover both phases, so it is not possible to split the figures between primary and secondary.

Nursery Education

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much money has been provided to each local education authority, on a ring-fenced basis, for the provision of nursery places for four-year-olds, since May 1997; and what criteria are used by his Department for the expenditure of that money. [119490]

Ms Hodge [holding answer 17 April 2000]: The following table shows the estimated amount of specific grant this Government have provided to each Local Education Authority, since May 1997, for four-year-old early education places, amounting to £631.2 million.

The criteria for the provision of this funding is set out in the "Requirements of Nursery Education Grant" which is issued to all Local Education Authorities annually. I have placed a copy of this in the Library.

In addition to this specific grant funding, the table also shows the level of funding provided, since April 1997, for the Under Fives Education Standard Spending Assessment (SSA) sub block, which has increased from £1,089 million in 1997–98 to £1,342 million in 2000–01, an increase of £253 million.

Human Rights and Disability

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what response he has made to the National Disability Council's report on Human Rights and Disability. [120832]

Ms Hodge [holding answer 8 May 2000]: The report "The Impact of the Human Rights Act on Disabled People" was prepared for, and recently published by, the National Disability Council and The Royal National Institute for Deaf People. The NDC has sent copies to the Chairs of the Disability Rights Commission, the Commission for Racial Equality, the Equal Opportunities Commission and to Northern Ireland's Equality Commission and Human Rights Commission and to a range of disability and other organisations, as a contribution to the debate on the human rights legislation.

It is an interesting report and we are considering how best to make use of the material that it contains.

Learning Accounts

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he will introduce the national arrangements for issuing individual learning accounts; who is the contractor selected; how many people have applied to individual TECs and remain on a waiting list; and what criteria will be applied for entitlements, including those in connection with transport and child care costs. [120833]

Mr. Wicks [holding answer 8 May 2000]: I can answer most of the hon. Member's question by referring him to the replies I have given to the previous parliamentary questions of 3 April and 4 May 2000, Official Report, columns 295W and 196W respectively.

Our latest figures show that in England, over 117,000 accounts had been opened by the end of March 2000. This is against a UK target of 100,000 accounts opened by April 2000, and we are on track to achieve the target of 1 million accounts opened in the lifetime of this Parliament.

I am pleased to announce that the Department has issued a letter of intent to Capita Group to start the development of these services under the national framework.

From April, we have been offering 80 per cent. discounts for computer literacy courses through Further Education colleges in England. Anyone aged 19 or over can open a learning account and claim the incentives. When deciding eligibility for the incentives, we will take into account the type of learning people plan to undertake and any Government financial support they already get for their chosen learning. Child care and transport costs will not be eligible for the incentives.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Regional Development Agencies

15. Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what arrangements he has made to monitor the performance of regional development agencies. [120154]

Ms Armstrong: We developed an interim evaluation and performance monitoring framework for the Regional Development Agencies (RDAs) prior to their establishment on 1 April last year. This framework included a set of core indicators that reflected the purposes for which the RDAs were set up, to be used by the RDAs in developing their regional strategies.

We undertook to review the interim framework within 18 months of the establishment of the RDAs, and we have recently started to take this review forward.

A38 Bypass

16. Mr. Breed: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on his bypass programme for the A38. [120155]

Mr. Hill: The Dobwalls bypass and the Saltash-Stoketon Cross improvement schemes are being considered under the London to South-West and South Wales multi-modal study. The outcome of the study will inform consideration of transport infrastructure requirements in preparing Regional Planning Guidance, including the need for improvements to the trunk road network.

New Houses (South-East)

17. Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received on his proposals for housebuilding in the South-East. [120156]

Mr. Raynsford: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is just beginning to receive representations on his proposals. These are subject to public consultation until 19 June. He expects to receive further representations to his "Proposed Changes to Draft Regional Planning Guidance" (RPG9) during the course of the consultation period.

Trans-European Road Network

18. Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on investment in Trans-European Network roads. [120157]

Mr. Hill: Parts of the national trunk road network have also been designated as Trans-European Network (TEN) routes. Our plans for investment in the trunk road network were set out in "A New Deal for Trunk Roads in England".

Air Pollution

19. Mr. Colman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on Government policy concerning the emission of greenhouse gases by aircraft within UK jurisdiction. [120158]

Mr. Mullin: Emissions from aircraft on domestic flights are already included in the UK totals and targets. The draft Climate Change Programme, published in March, sets out our plans for delivering the UK's target under the Kyoto Protocol and moving towards our domestic goal of a 20 per cent. cut in carbon dioxide emissions by 2010. We are also working in ICAO towards the reduction of emissions from international aviation.

Fishing Vessels (Safety)

20. Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to modify the regulations governing the safety of the crews of United Kingdom-registered fishing vessels. [120160]

Mr. Hill: We have recently introduced the Fishing Vessels (EC Directive on Harmonised Safety Regime) Regulations 1999, and we are continuing to implement occupational health and safety directives. We propose to introduce a safety code for under-12m fishing vessels and to review the UK Fishing Vessel (Safety Provisions) 1975.

Transatlantic Aviation Market

21. Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to raise the full liberalisation of the transatlantic aviation market at the bilateral talks with the United States in June. [120161]

Mr. Mullin: The Government will persist in their efforts to secure the liberalisation of the UK/US aviation market at the next round of formal talks to be held in June.

Cheam Station

22. Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make improvements to the condition and fabric of Cheam station a condition of the re-award of the relevant franchise. [120162]

Mr. Hill: As the hon. Gentleman will know from the recent adjournment debate about the replacement of the Connex South Central franchise, my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister has issued instructions to the Franchising Director asking him to deliver improvements through renegotiation of franchise agreements. The replacement bids for this franchise must include proposals for improved station facilities and a cleaner, safer station environment.

Green Belt

23. Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to protect existing green belt areas. [120163]

Mr. Raynsford: Planning Policy Guidance note 2 already states that land in designated green belts should be protected against inappropriate development. Local planning authorities must take it into account in preparing their development plans and in individual development control decisions.

Climate Change

24. Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent research he has commissioned to determine the effects of climate change on human health. [120164]

Mr. Meacher: My Department supports research on the global impacts of climate change on human health from the London School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine. The Department of Health has commissioned a report from the Institute for Environment and Health on the possible impacts of climate change on health in the UK.

Railtrack Safety Company

25. Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the safety company of Railtrack will be incorporated; and when the managing director will be appointed. [120165]

Mr. Hill: The Health and Safety Executive and the Rail Regulator will shortly be starting a statutory consultation on changes to Regulations and to Railtrack's licence necessary to enable the new company to function. I understand that Railtrack is proceeding as far as it can with the arrangements for setting up the new company.

Regeneration

26. Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps the Government are taking to ensure that disadvantaged neighbourhoods outside the inner cities benefit from regeneration programmes. [120166]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Renewing and revitalising poor neighbourhoods has consistently been a high priority for this Government and a consultation framework on the National Strategy for Neighbourhood Renewal was published by the Social Exclusion Unit in April. We are already addressing the needs of disadvantaged neighbourhoods outside the inner cities through the Single Regeneration Budget but the future role of all the regeneration programmes is being considered in the current spending review.

Fifth Freedom Rights

27. Sir Sydney Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions which non-United Kingdom and non-United States carriers have received further fifth freedom rights from the UK in the last year; and which applications are still outstanding. [120167]

Mr. Mullin: In the last year the UK has granted new fifth freedom traffic rights, or additional frequencies to existing rights, to the designated airline or airlines of the following countries:

Bahrain
Bangladesh
Greece
India
Luxembourg
Mauritius
Namibia
Pakistan
Uganda.

Requests for new fifth freedom rights are often made in the course of negotiations but are then not pursued.

Regional Airports (Access)

28. Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on access by non-UK carriers to regional airports. [120168]

Mr. Mullin: Since June 1998 all bilateral partners with whom we did not already have liberal air services agreements have been offered unrestricted access to all UK regional airports, so long as UK airlines are also allowed to operate on the same routes. Some 17 countries have accepted the offer, and it has been discussed in virtually all air services negotiations held since June 1998.

Organophosphates

29. Mr. Tyler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will circulate the revised HSE Guidance Note MS17, entitled "Medical Aspects of Work-Related Exposure to Organophosphates", to (a) potential users of organophosphates and (b) GPs. [120169]

Mr. Meacher: No. MS17 is a priced publication available on that basis to anyone, but it is written for doctors and other health professionals and would not be helpful to the general user of organophosphates. All GPs are being made aware of its existence, but it would be wasteful to distribute it to the many who will have no cause to refer to it.

Transport for London

30. Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he intends to meet the Mayor of London to discuss the entry into operation of Transport for London. [120170]

Mr. Hill: My right hon. Friend will be meeting the Mayor of London in due course to discuss a range of issues, including transport.

Thames Gateway

31. Mr. Paul Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the future development of the Thames Gateway. [120171]

Ms Beverley Hughes: My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister announced on 7 March that the Thames Gateway remains a focus for development and an opportunity for growth in the south-east. Draft Regional Planning Guidance published on 22 March identifies the regeneration of the area as a national and regional priority and proposes an extension of the boundary into south Essex. Stronger implementation structures, including a new strategic partnership and local delivery mechanisms, are being discussed with local and regional organisations in the area.

Local Authority Debt

32. Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the trend in the level of external local authority debt in the last three years for which figures are available. [120172]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The trend in the level of external debt of local authorities in England is broadly flat. Total external debt has been estimated at about £37 billion at end March in each of the years 1997, 1998 and 1999.

Second and Holiday Homes

33. Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the extent of (a) second and (b) holiday home ownership in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement. [120173]

Mr. Mullin: Estimates based on the Survey of English Housing (SEH) indicate that there were about 234,000 English households who owned second homes in England and Wales in 1998–99.

Some 46 per cent. of SEH respondents owning a second home included "holiday home/retirement home/weekend cottage" as one of their reasons for having the second home. This would indicate a figure for holiday home ownership of around 108,000.

There is no comparable recent and reliable source of information on people whose main residence is in Wales who have a second home in England or Wales.

Packaging Waste

34. Jane Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the packaging waste compliance scheme registration fee structure. [120174]

Mr. Meacher: In the light of experience with the current arrangements, we intend to consult shortly on an alternative structure for registration fees for compliance schemes.

NATS Employees (Share Allocation)

35. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many shares are to be allocated to NATS employees under the arrangements proposed in the Transport Bill. [120175]

Mr. Mullin: The Government propose that 5 per cent. of NATS shares are to be made available for an employee share scheme. Details will be worked up in due course following consultation with NATS' employee representatives and, when selected, the strategic partner.

Regional Development Agency (Yorkshire and Humberside)

36. Kali Mountford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the work of the regional development agency in the Yorkshire and Humberside region. [120176]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Government have set Yorkshire Forward the challenging task of leading the revitalisation of the Yorkshire and Humber economy. The first step towards this goal was made with the production of a Regional Economic Strategy. The strategy, a well structured framework for promoting economic development and competitiveness in the region, was welcomed by the Government earlier this year.

Yorkshire Forward is now working with other partners to develop a series of Action Plans to take forward key actions in the Strategy. At the same time, Yorkshire Forward has made good use of its programme funding to secure new investment in the region, to create new jobs and to address the skills gap.

Workplace Parking Tax

37. Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the likely impact of the proposed workplace parking tax on local economies. [120177]

Mr. Hill: Research indicates that a levy on workplace parking can help to tackle traffic congestion. Less congestion will help to improve the competitiveness of local economies. In addition, the hypothecation of the revenues raised for improving local transport will help to maintain their vitality.

We will require local authorities that choose to bring forward a workplace parking levy scheme to assess the likely impact of their scheme, including its effect on the local economy, before the Secretary of State approves the order to give effect to the scheme.

Village Speed Limits

38. Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list those authorities which have completed the introduction of a programme of village speed limits throughout their area. [120178]

Mr. Hill: The setting of local speed limits is a matter for local authorities who are not obliged to inform central Government of the number or whereabouts of local speed limits they have in force.

CITES

Mr. Burgon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Conference of the Parties to the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species which took place in Gigiri, Kenya, from 10 to 20 April. [121623]

Mr. Meacher: A record 130 countries attended the Conference, which took place in a positive and friendly atmosphere in the excellent facilities provided at UNEP HQ.

The Conference considered 62 proposals to amend the species covered by CITES, which are listed in two Appendices. Appendix I lists highly endangered species which are prohibited in international commerce. Appendix II lists other endangered species in the table, which includes details of the final position taken by the UK (in accordance with the EU's common position) on those proposals which were put to the Conference for decision.

The UK achieved its main objective on the key proposals for elephants, turtles and whales. Our own proposal to list the basking shark on Appendix II achieved 61 per cent. support—the highest vote for any of the three shark proposals before the Conference. Unfortunately a two-thirds majority was required and the majority of states which use basking shark fins voted against our efforts to ensure that fisheries were managed sustainably and trade levels monitored.

We were particularly disappointed that representatives from the Food and Agriculture Organisation (FAO) intervened in the debate on behalf of overseas fishing industry interests, and partly disowned their own technical report which showed that species like the basking shark are particularly suitable for CITES management. Given the continuing threat to this species, and the strength of our scientific case which was widely acknowledged, the Government intend to work with our European Union colleagues to list the basking shark on Appendix III of CITES as soon as possible. If agreed, this would make any transaction between the EU and other states in basking shark products subject to the EU CITES Regulations.

Another major UK proposal at the Conference—to establish a working group to address unsustainable trade in bushmeat—has been strongly endorsed. Initially, the working group will focus on the management of bushmeat harvesting and trade in six African countries with particular problems such as dislocation caused by irresponsible forest exploitation by international timber companies and unsustainable demand for bushmeat from urban areas. My Department is making £50,000 available in the current financial year to support this initiative, and we look forward to contributions from other CITES Parties and non-Governmental bodies.

I would also like to highlight two other UK achievements at the Conferences. First we ensured that most of the tough recommendations made in the recent CITES Tiger Missions, led by the UK, were endorsed and that countries which fail to implement them can as a last resort face wildlife trade sanctions. As a potential consumer state, the UK will continue to maintain a vigilant profile through education, detection and prosecution to prevent any revival in the use of tiger products for traditional medicine in this country. Secondly, I would like to pay tribute to representatives of HM Customs and Excise and the Police who organised a widely praised exhibition of the UK's work to enforce CITES. Two recent convictions in the UK for illegal trade in shahtoosh and parrots have demonstrated the increasing commitment of statutory enforcement agencies to tackle wildlife crime. I hope that the proposed Wildlife Crime Unit, which I announced on 16 February, will enable us to build on these achievements.

Waste Management Licensing

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) if he will extend the scope of the Waste Management (Licensing) Regulations so that judgment on fit and proper person status takes into account relevant convictions in other EU countries; [118780]

(2) if convictions in other countries are taken into consideration when assessing applicants' fit and proper person status for the purpose of waste management licensing; [118778]

(3) what relevant convictions under UK law are taken into consideration when assessing applicants for fit and proper person status for the purpose of waste management licensing. [118779]

Mr. Meacher: Offences which are taken into consideration in Great Britain when assessing "fit and proper person" status are those set out in regulation 3 of the Waste Management Licensing Regulations 1994 (S.I. 1994 No. 1056) (as amended). Convictions in other countries are not currently taken into consideration when assessing applicants' fit and proper person status for the purpose of these provisions and waste management licensing. However, we are considering whether the list of relevant offences should be extended to take into account convictions in other EU countries, although there is at present no EU-wide mechanism to support such a system.

The amendment of the 1994 Regulations in relation to Wales is a devolved function and would be a matter for the National Assembly for Wales.

Bull Bars

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to ban the use of bull bars on public roads. [120281]

Mr. Hill: As stated in our recently published Road Safety Strategy "Tomorrow's Roads—Safer for Everyone", we believe that the anticipated European Commission proposal to make all new car fronts safer would be the best way of preventing particularly dangerous bull bars being fitted to vehicles. We are currently awaiting the opportunity to examine the details of the Commission's draft proposal. We had expected this to be put forward in mid-March, and were disappointed when this proved not to be possible. We are now urging the Commission to bring forward their proposal at the earliest opportunity.

We are keen to see bull bars tackled as soon as possible, on an effective Europe-wide basis. We are therefore also submitting a scientific proposal to the Commission for bull bars to be controlled by an amendment to the external projections directive as an interim measure.

Disabled Access (Stations)

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what percentage of (a) London Underground and (b) Railtrack stations have disabled access; what steps are being taken to increase provision; and if he will make a statement. [120279]

Mr. Hill: 20 per cent. of London Underground stations have wheelchair access to at least one direction of travel on at least one line. It is anticipated that the number of tube stations with disabled access will increase to 45 per cent. through the PPP contracts.

22 per cent. of Railtrack stations have wheelchair access from the street. Railtrack has a strategy to make all stations fully accessible to the disabled within 20 years. Railtrack are awaiting the outcome of the Rail Regulator's periodic review of their access charges, which are due later this year, before finalising their programme of improvements.

Noise Pollution

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) if he will instruct the Highways Agency to prepare plans for noise pollution barriers on the section of the M62 adjoining to Bradley Wood, Huddersfield; [120129]

(2) what steps he is taking to ensure that noise pollution caused by motorways is reduced. [120128]

Mr. Hill: No. The Government set out their policy towards dealing with the problems of traffic noise arising from motorways and other roads managed by the Highways Agency in "A New Deal for Trunk Roads in England". We expect considerable benefits to be achieved by the increased use of quieter surfaces both for new trunk roads and for those needing maintenance. In addition, we have asked the Highways Agency to consider the case for providing noise mitigation in the worst cases where no other action was being taken to provide relief for residential properties. The Government are also supporting the implementation of a proposed EU Directive that will require vehicle tyres to meet noise emission limits.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what arrangements he has made with the Highways Agency to increase sound pollution barriers when stretches of existing motorways are (a) upgraded and (b) modified. [120130]

Mr. Hill: The Highways Agency is required to assess the potential adverse effects on the environment of any modifications to existing motorways which involve physical alterations. With regard to noise, the effectiveness of any existing sound barriers will be taken into account and proposals for upgrading them or for alternative measures to be provided in conjunction with the alteration will be considered.

Open-cast Mining Sites (Scotland)

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how often open-cast mining sites in Scotland were inspected by the Health and Safety Executive in the last three years; and what plans he has to increase the frequency of inspections in the coming year. [120791]

Mr. Meacher: Health and Safety Executive inspectors carry out routine preventative inspections of workplaces according to the hazards and risks of the workplace. With open-cast coal mines such inspections are normally made once per year. In addition an inspector may visit for other reasons, e.g. to investigate an accident or complaint.

As of 31 March 2000 there were 106 open-cast coal mines registered in Scotland of which 28 were operational. All the operational sites were inspected during 1999–2000. Over the last three years a total of 254 inspection contacts were recorded at open-cast sites in Scotland by inspectors. These included visits to non-operational sites to check their status.

HSE has no plans to change this inspection strategy.

Road Hauliers (Compensation)

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Morecambe and Lunesdale (Miss Smith), of 19 April 2000, Official Report, column 485W, if he will list those areas of sustained effort which required departmental and diplomatic activity in the settlement of claims by road hauliers affected by the 1996 dispute; and what total sums of claims (a) have been agreed and (b) were refused by the French Government. [120847]

Mr. Hill: Action included numerous meetings with the French Ministry of Transport and with the Interior Ministry, initially to clarify the scope of the French compensation code, the legal and administrative procedures for submitting claims and the basis on which claims should be prepared. Subsequent meetings dealt with the lack of consistency among Préfectures in the application of the rules; their application in particular circumstances, including in respect of lorries that were blocked in more than one Département and those that were prevented from entering France; the delay in processing claims and the revised arrangements introduced to speed up the process. The trade associations were also represented at some of the meetings.

Officials also spent a great deal of time giving guidance to claimants and assisting them in lodging claims. However, claimants are under no obligation to inform the Department of the outcome of their cases. We are therefore unable to provide information about amounts of compensation paid and refused.

Speed Limits

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to allow the erection of signs in home zone areas instructing drivers to drive at very slow speeds. [120984]

Mr. Hill: Local traffic authorities have the powers to introduce 20mph speed limits and associated signing without seeking consent from the Secretary of State. For the pilot home zones in England, we will consider authorising the use of advisory 10mph maximum speed signs. This will depend on the effectiveness of engineering measures or 20mph speed limits in reducing vehicle speeds.

Croydon Tramlink

Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when his Department last assessed the level of passenger demand for the Croydon Tramlink. [120841]

Mr. Hill: The Department assessed levels of passenger demand for Croydon Tramlink prior to the Concession Agreement being signed in 1996. In line with the PFI nature of the project, assessment of passenger demand for Tramlink is now a matter for the concessionaire Tramtrack Croydon Ltd. (TCL). I understand that in April this year TCL estimated that Croydon Tramlink will carry more than 20 million passengers a year.

Utility Road Works

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he is taking to encourage utility companies and others to co-ordinate their activities in order to reduce the number of occasions on which roads and pavements are dug up. [121062]

Mr. Hill: Street works undertakers are required under the New Roads and Street Works Act 1991 to co-operate with highway authorities and one another to co-ordinate their works, in the interests of safety, and in order to minimise inconvenience to road users and protect the street and apparatus in it. This duty of co-ordination is backed by criminal sanctions. Highway authorities for their part must co-ordinate works of all kinds in the streets for which they are responsible. A code of practice issued under the Act sets out the co-ordination machinery in detail.

Regulations made last year under the 1991 Act aim to facilitate and encourage the electronic transfer of information about street works and other works in the highway between utilities and highway authorities, by way of a system known as ETON which makes use of the internet. This will ensure greater consistency and speed in transferring and registering the information, which in turn will help authorities in their co-ordination role.

On 5 April, in addition to announcing its intention to develop a scheme to charge utilities for street works which are unreasonably prolonged, the Government also stated that it would work with highway authorities and utilities to develop best practice on street works. Co-ordination and quality of work were specifically mentioned as areas to cover. We aim to publish guidance later this year.

Bilateral Air Service Agreement

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what the Government's policy is on granting the European Commission a mandate to negotiate bilateral air service agreement between the EU and the US; [121285]

(2) if it is his objective to achieve full liberalisation of air services between the UK and the US as a result of the forthcoming bilateral air service agreement talks with the US; [121283]

(3) what his policy is on open skies in the context of the forthcoming bilateral air talks with the US Government; [121284]

(4) what recent discussions he has had with his US counterpart on bilateral air service agreement; [121281]

(5) what HM Government's aims are in the forthcoming bilateral air service agreement talks with the US Government; and if he will make a statement. [121282]

Mr. Mullin: It is the Government's policy to secure the liberalisation of the UK/US aviation market, an objective often referred to as 'open skies'. In pursuit of this objective, my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister has spoken on a number of occasions with the US Secretary for Transportation, and has met him twice this year.

Our aim in negotiations is to remove all capacity and route restrictions on UK-US traffic, thereby increasing competition to the benefit of consumers, provided UK carriers can gain effective access to the US domestic market and so compete on fair terms.

As regards a mandate for the EU, our priority continues to be our bilateral negotiations with the US and we are not persuaded of the advantages of granting the Commission a mandate. Nevertheless, we have taken part constructively in discussions with EU colleagues and the Commission on the technical detail of what a possible mandate might contain.

Forth Rail Bridge

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will call for reports from Rigblast and Railtrack about the use of blasting techniques on the Forth Rail Bridge. [120866]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 8 May 2000]: I understand that the Scottish Environmental Protection Agency and the Health and Safety Executive are closely monitoring the work currently being undertaken by Railtrack and its contractors.

Pollution

Mr. Derek Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many incidents have been reported in each of the last five years for which figures are available of (a) deaths and (b) injuries caused by uncontrolled releases of (i) hydrocarbons, (ii) ammonia and (iii) HFCs. [120422]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 8 May 2000]: In the context of refrigeration systems, the statistical information held by the Health and Safety Executive is not sufficiently detailed to determine whether any reported deaths and injuries have been caused by uncontrolled releases of hydrocarbons, ammonia and HFCs. Hydrocarbons have been interpreted only in the context of refrigeration and not its wider definition which would include substances such as petrol and LPG.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Public Bodies (Appointments)

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the appointments made to public bodies by the first minister and deputy first minister during the period of devolution from November 1999 to February 2000. [120633]

Mr. Mandelson: The appointments made to public bodies in Northern Ireland by the First Minister and Deputy First Minister during the period of devolution were as follows:

Planning Appeals Commission
Part-time Commissioner—T. McCaw

NI Economic Council
Chairman—Mrs. J. M. Trewsdale
Member—Prof. B. K. Ashcroft

Farmers (Early Retirement)

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will introduce an early retirement scheme for farmers; and if he will make a statement. [120736]

Mr. Ingram: As the hon. Member is aware, an early retirement scheme is one of the discretionary measures provided for under the Rural Development Regulation. However, such a scheme would be expensive. It would benefit relatively few people and would have to be paid for by many others. Given the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development's existing budget and current commitments, it is simply not affordable at present. As a result, an early retirement scheme has not been included as one of the measures to be introduced in Northern Ireland in the period 2000–06 under the Rural Development (Accompanying Measures) Plan. However, a scheme has not been entirely ruled out and can be considered in the later years of the Plan period when modulation receipts are at their maximum. It is, however, a very costly option and it would need to be demonstrated that such a scheme would offer value for money.

Agrimonetary Compensation

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when agrimonetary compensation will be made available for the arable, beef and sheep sectors in (a) 2000 and (b) 2002; and if he will make a statement. [120755]

Mr. Ingram: In terms of optional agrimonetary compensation, payments to the sheep sector will be made with the first advance on ewe premium in July 2000.

The bulk of payments to the beef sector, i.e. beef special premium and suckler cow premium, will be made from October 2000.

In terms of compulsory agrimonetary compensation, the second instalment of compensation to beef and arable producers will be paid from October 2000 with the third instalment a year later. The third instalment for sheep is likely to be paid in April 2001.

No payments are presently planned for 2002.

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland for what reason the Government did not provide the agrimonetary compensation available in 2000 to the (a) beef, (b) sheep and (c) arable sectors; and if he will make a statement. [120756]

Mr. Ingram: Compulsory agrimonetary compensation totalling up to £88 million will be payable in 2000 to the UK arable, beef and sheep sectors. The Prime Minister's announcement of 30 March 2000 made available further optional compensation totalling £66 million to the beef, sheep and dairy sectors. This balanced the difficulties faced by the agricultural industry with the impact on the UK Exchequer. Drawing down agrimonetary compensation (which must be paid on a UK-wide basis) has considerable public expenditure implications: once the Fontainbleau rebate is taken into account, the cost of the 30 March agrimonetary package to the UK Exchequer is approximately £50 million. Expenditure of the magnitude involved must be judged carefully against the many competing demands on the public purse.

Union Flag

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether a Union flag has been provided at the Roads Service Maintenance Depot, Ballinahone, Armagh City; who has been made responsible for hoisting the Union flag at these premises on the designated dates; whether St. Patrick's day and Easter day were recognised by the flying of the Union flag at these premises; and if he will make a statement about the arrangements to fly the Union flag at this Depot. [120796]

Mr. Ingram: Responsibility for the subject in question has been delegated to the Roads Service under its chief executive, Mr. C. James.

I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from C. James to Mr. John D. Taylor, dated 8 May 2000:

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has asked me to respond to your recently tabled Parliamentary Question about the flying of the Union Flag at the Roads Service Maintenance Depot, Ballinahonemore Road, Armagh.

I can advise that a Union Flag has been provided at the Depot and that the Premises Officer for the building is responsible for flying the flag on the designated dates. Regrettably, due to an oversight, the flag was not flown on St. Patrick's Day or Easter Day this year. I have, however, reminded relevant staff of the instructions for flags to be flown on designated dates.

I hope you find this information helpful.

Public Authorities

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he will make an order listing the public authorities to be designated under section 75(3)(a) and (d) of the Northern Ireland Act 1998; what bodies are to be included in the initial order; and what bodies he proposes to consult in relation to the second order. [120702]

Mr. Mandelson: The majority of public bodies to which section 75 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 applies are identified in the legislation. In relation to designation under section 75(3)(a) and (d) of the Act, it is intended to lay before Parliament, as soon as possible, an order which will list a number of bodies in respect of which consultation is complete. In regard to the second order, it is intended to consult a number of additional bodies suggested by the Equality Commission and which carry out functions relating to Northern Ireland.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

BSE

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will call for a report on recent research in Switzerland concerning tests capable of detecting sub-clinical infection of BSE. [120652]

Ms Quin: A Swiss company, Prionics, has developed a test for the post mortem diagnosis of BSE in cattle, the Prionics Check Test. In a recent evaluation of selected BSE screening diagnostic tests conducted under the auspices of the European Commission, the Prionics Check Test detected all clinically affected animals which were histopathologically positive. Prionics have also published the results of a validation of their test on clinical cattle. Swiss authorities have used the test to survey healthy cattle slaughtered for human consumption, casualty animals also slaughtered for human consumption and fallen stock. They have identified a small number of positive animals, especially among the casualty and fallen stock categories.

This test was employed in a survey of British cattle more than five years of age slaughtered under the over-thirty-months scheme. The survey involved the examination of a systematic sample of 4,136 cattle. The Prionics Check Test was not found to be more sensitive than conventional histopathological examination of brain samples. The comparative data obtained by histopathological diagnosis at the Veterinary Laboratories Agency indicate that the Prionics Check Test is capable of detecting BSE-infected animals only three months or less before the onset of clinical signs and, at present, cannot be regarded as being capable of detecting BSE-infected animals at an earlier stage.

Badger Culling

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the (a) number and (b) species of non-target animals which have been caught in cage traps set for badgers in the TB trial cull; if he will indicate (i) the number which were injured but released, (ii) the number which (A) were found dead and (B) needed to be dispatched as a result of their injuries and (iii) the nature of the injuries; and if he will make a statement. [120775]

Ms Quin [holding answer 4 May 2000]: In trial operations to date 373 non-target animals and birds have been captured, of which 336 were released uninjured. For the remainder the information requested is as follows:

Species	Number found dead	Number found injured and despatched	Nature of injuries
Grey Squirrel	5	10	caught in mesh bars of trap
Pheasant	5	9	head injuries
Rook	2	1	wing/leg damage
Jay	1	3	wing/leg damage
Fox	0	1	serious mange

No injured animals were released.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has for the badger culling trial to observe a closed season; and if he will make a statement. [120776]

Ms Quin [holding answer 4 May 2000]: The badger culling trial incorporates a closed season from 1 February to 30 April inclusive. During this period no trapping or culling takes place.

Fishing Industry

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when and for what reason he decided to transfer 200 tonnes of plaice and sole to Belgium; and what consultations he held with the industry. [119236]

Mr. Morley: A "gentlemen's agreement" has been reached with Belgium, Ireland and the Netherlands—welcomed by the UK industry—on the withdrawal of beam trawlers until 1 May from the northern part of the Irish sea closed to protect spawning cod. In the context of arriving at that agreement, the UK undertook to transfer 190 tonnes of North Sea plaice and 5 tonnes of sole in ICES Areas VIId and VIIfg to the Belgian authorities for them to allocate.

This transfer was in recognition of the good will shown by the Belgians, who have substantial flatfish quotas in the Irish sea, in reaching agreement with us and of our on-going co-operation with them in matters of quota management including assistance with quota transfer to ourselves. The transfer was not the subject of prior consultation with the industry but it came from stocks that were underfished in 1999, particularly North sea plaice where the underfish exceeded 10,000 tonnes.

No British fisherman will suffer a reduction in fishing opportunities as a result of this arrangement. 50 tonnes of North sea sole obtained through economic link license conditions has also been allocated to the inshore sector.

Bovine TB

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many confirmed cases of bovine TB there were in Staffordshire and Derbyshire in (a) 1997, (b) 1998 and (c) 1999; and if he will make a statement. [120778]

Ms Quin [holding answer 4 May 2000]: The number of herds in Staffordshire and Derbyshire where bovine TB has been confirmed were:

	Derbyshire	Staffordshire
1997	1	24
1998	6	30
1999	19	35

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many badger road casualties tested as positive for bovine TB in (a) Staffordshire, (b) Derbyshire, (c) Cheshire, (d) Shropshire and (e) England and Wales in (i) 1997, (ii) 1998 and (iii) 1999. [120772]

Ms Quin [holding answer 4 May 2000]: In the period concerned, badger road casualties were collected at the discretion of Divisional Veterinary Managers. The number of badger road casualties that tested positive for bovine TB were:

	1997	1998	1999
Staffordshire	6	8	6
Derbyshire	0	0	2
Cheshire	0	0	0
England and Wales	80	101	71

[1] In 1999 carcases were collected only between January and August.

Fallen Stock

Mr. Gray: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to the answer of 12 April 2000, Official Report, column 220W, on fallen stock, how many knackermen own approved incinerators for the disposal of specified risk material. [120769]

Ms Quin [holding answer 4 May 2000]: Twenty-six knackers' yards have incinerators which are approved to incinerate specified risk material.

SCOTLAND

Assisted Areas

Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many responses were received by his Department in respect of the revised assisted areas map; and how many responses (a) objected to and (b) supported the removal of Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch, and Strathspey from the proposed map. [120924]

Dr. Reid [holding answer 5 May 2000]: During the consultation period following the 10 April announcement of revised Assisted Area map proposals, a total of 83 responses were received by my Department, of which a total of 63 related to all of or parts of Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey areas.

Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what the criteria were which excluded Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey from the revised assisted areas map. [120926]

Dr. Reid [holding answer 5 May 2000]: The July 1999 Assisted Area map proposals put forward the Highlands and Islands NUTS 2 area as a whole, for inclusion on the basis of its population sparsity. However, the European Commission would not accept this, and the Inverness NUTS 3 area does not on its own meet the sparsity criterion.

Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will rank Scottish constituencies by (a) the reduction and (b) the increase in population coverage proposed in the revised assisted areas map. [120927]

Dr. Reid [holding answer 5 May 2000]: The information requested is contained in the table (but see note following).

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Millennium Dome

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many corporate hospitality events have taken place at the dome to date; and how many are planned. [119307]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 17 April 2000]: During the period 1 January to 15 April 2000 there were 456 corporate hospitality events. For the period 16 April to 31 December 2000 there are 105 confirmed events and a further 476 provisional bookings awaiting confirmation.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much financial contribution to the New Millennium Experience Company corporate hospitality events at the dome (a) have made to date and (b) are expected to make. [119308]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 17 April 2000]: To date corporate hospitality events have represented 17 per cent. of total catering sales. Corporate hospitality events are expected to represent approximately 20 per cent. of all catering sales.

Forth Rail Bridge

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what action he has taken since June 1999 to promote the inclusion of the Forth Rail Bridge as a UNESCO World Heritage Site; what progress has been made with preparing a management plan as required by UNESCO for such sites; and if he will make a statement. [120865]

Mr. Alan Howarth [holding answer 8 May 2000]: Responsibility for nominating the Forth Bridge to UNESCO for World Heritage (WH) Site status, including arrangements for producing a Management Plan, lies with the Scottish Executive. The Forth Rail Bridge is one of 25 sites included in the UK's Tentative List of sites which may be nominated to UNESCO for WH Site status over the next 10 years. My Department is liaising with the Devolved Administrations and other interested bodies over the order and timing of future nominations, taking into account the UNESCO World Heritage Committee's priorities for action.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Back to Work Bonus

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of the back to work bonus; and if he will make a statement. [120802]

Angela Eagle: An evaluation of the back to work bonus has recently been completed, with the publication in April of the final report "Prospects of Part-Time Work: the Impact of the Back to Work Bonus". A copy has been placed in the Library.

We will ensure that the back to work bonus continues to complement other measures that provide cash help for people moving from benefits to work.

Job Seeker's Allowance

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what (a) proportion and (b) number of people who claimed job seeker's allowance in 1999 declared part-time work; what their average earnings were (i) per hour and (ii) per week; and if he will make a statement. [120801]

Angela Eagle: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

Job Seeker's allowance (income-based) claimants with part-time earnings, February to November 1999

	Number
Number of claimants	33,000
Average weekly part-time earnings	£28.31
Percentage of total JSA(IB) claimants	3.6

1. Figures are based on a four-quarterly average of point in time surveys throughout 1999.
2. Claimant figure has been rounded to the nearest thousand.
3. Sample size 5 per cent., therefore subject to sampling error.
4. No account is taken of any partner's earnings.
5. Numbers represent income-based JSA cases where either an amount is taken into account or disregarded from their benefit. It will not therefore include claimants who declare work but receive no remuneration.
6. Information about the hourly level of average earnings is not available.

Stakeholder Pensions

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate the Government have made of the impact of demutualisation of life insurers and private pension providers on the provision of stakeholder pensions. [121031]

Mr. Rooker: It is expected that both mutual and shareholder owned providers will be offering stakeholder pensions from April 2001. Both will operate under the same rules. There is no indication that demutualisation will have an impact on the provision of stakeholder pensions.

Family Support

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what initiatives have been introduced since 1 May 1997 to support the family, with particular reference to cases in which there are children at risk. [120674]

Angela Eagle: We are committed to giving children the best possible start. Measures announced so far in this Parliament will help lift 1.2 million children out of poverty, and are a major step in achieving our commitment to eradicating child poverty. Measures since 1 May 1997 include:

Child Benefit (CHB)—36 per cent. increase in rate for eldest child. Further above-inflation rise April 2000: standard rate CHB £15 for eldest child, £10 for other children.

Income-related benefits—child allowance for under-11s up by £4.70 from last October. New allowance for children aged 0–16 now £26.60. Support for children under 11 in the income-related benefits up by over 50 per cent. in two years.

Sure Start Maternity Grant—April 2000: payments double from £100 to £200, and to £300 from this autumn.

Working Families Tax Credit (WFTC)—extra help for low-income working families. Includes new allowance for disabled children, extra £21.90 on top of other child allowances, and from June, a £4.35 increase in under-16 child credit (Income Support/Jobseeker's Allowance/Housing Benefits child allowance increase from October).

Childcare Tax Credit—part of WFTC, 70 per cent. of eligible child care costs up to a maximum of £100 for one child, £150 for two or more.

Children's Tax Credit—April 2001, new Tax Credit, worth up to £442 a year.

Integrated Child Credit—from 2003, will bring together different strands of help for children currently contained in benefits and tax system.

In all, we will provide an additional £7 billion a year in new tax and benefit measures for families with children by the end of this Parliament. By April 2001, as a result of budget changes to personal tax and benefits, families with children will be, on average, £850 a year better off.

Later this year we will be publishing our second annual report on tackling poverty and social exclusion, monitoring progress so far.

Winter Fuel Payments

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people aged 60 years and above are ineligible for the winter fuel payments because they (a) are in (i) residential care, (ii) nursing homes and (iii) local authority residential accommodation, (b) live abroad, (c) are in prison and (d) are in hospital. [120384]

Angela Eagle: Winter Fuel Payments are provided to older people who are ordinarily resident in Great Britain to help towards their winter heating costs. Where someone is already receiving public assistance with their heating costs it is inappropriate for a Winter Fuel Payment to be made. For example, payments are inappropriate for people living permanently in residential care or nursing homes who also receive help through Income Support or income-based Jobseeker's Allowance. It is also inappropriate for Winter Fuel Payments be made to people who do not contribute towards their heating costs, such as those serving a prison sentence or those who have been receiving free hospital in-patient treatment.

The estimated number of people aged 60 or over who were receiving public assistance during the winter of 1999 are set out by category:

	Number
Residential care homes	199,000
Nursing homes	20,000
Local Authority residential accommodation	6,000
Sentenced prisoners	900
Hospital in-patients	12,000

Note:
Numbers are rounded to the nearest thousand.

All estimates are for November 1999 except the estimate for hospital in-patients which is for March 1999. It is not possible to estimate the number of people aged 60 or over who are ineligible for a Winter Fuel Payment because they live abroad, as we do not hold records for those among them who do not receive a social security benefit.

Family Benefits

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many families have been in receipt of (a) family credit and (b) the working families tax credit in each month since May 1997. [121035]

Angela Eagle: Family Credit was replaced with Working Families Tax Credit (WFTC) from 5 October 1999.

The information is in the table.

WALES

Elected Mayors

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what recent discussions he has had with the Local Government Association with regard to the introduction of elected mayors in Wales. [115583]

Mr. Hanson: I have discussed this and other issues relating to the Local Government Bill in a series of meetings with the Welsh Local Government Association over the last few months.

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has for the remuneration of elected mayors in Wales. [115581]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The level of remuneration of elected mayors will be for their own local authorities to determine. The National Assembly for Wales and the Welsh Local Government Association are in the process of setting up a review of special responsibility allowances, which will recommend appropriate levels of allowances for senior councillors, including elected mayors. It is intended that the result of the review will be published before the summer.

Local Government

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what recent discussions he has had with the First Secretary concerning the efficacy of the cabinet system in the management of local government in Wales; and if he will make a statement. [118187]

Mr. Hanson: I am in regular contact with the Assembly Secretary for Local Government, Peter Law, over the provisions of the Local Government Bill which include provision for new executive structures for councils. The Government are committed to the modernisation of local government in England and Wales, and the new executive structures are vital to the overall aims of transparency, efficiency and accountability.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Public Toilets

Ms Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) how many public toilets were closed between April 1998 and April 1999; [120489]

(2) what plans he has to introduce best value performance indicators covering the provisions of public toilets; [120492]

(3) if he will make public toilet provision a statutory obligation for local government; [120491]

(4) what plans he has to tackle vandalism and drug misuse in public toilets. [120490]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Owing to changes in the definition used by the Audit Commission, it is not possible accurately to ascertain the total number of public toilets closed between April 1998 and April 1999. However, while the total number of public toilets counted in England increased from 6,128 to 6,643, the number of public toilets open more than 12 hours a day decreased from 6,128 to 4,133. Figures for Wales are not yet available.

The Audit Commission has specified, for the current financial year, a mandatory performance indicator for local authorities in respect of > the number of conveniences sites provided by the authority normally throughout the year.

The Government have no plans to specify a best value performance indicator in this respect, or to replace the current discretionary power to provide public toilets with a statutory obligation.

The Government believe that the most effective way to tackle drug misuse and vandalism is through co-ordinated preventive action at a local level, involving all of the relevant agencies such as the police, local authorities and schools. That is why police and local authorities now have a statutory duty, under the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, jointly to develop partnerships to tackle crime and disorder in their area.

The strategies which have been produced by the 376 partnerships in England and Wales include a wide range of initiatives—many of which specifically target drug misuse and criminal damage.

GM Crops

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what action his Department takes to warn beekeepers when genetically modified crops are planted close to their apiaries. [120696]

Mr. Meacher: The legislation requires that proposed locations of releases of GM crops for research purposes (Part B) have to be advertised locally before sowing takes place. The advertisement must give information on the name and address of the applicant, the GM crop, the location and general purpose of the trial and the foreseen sowing dates. A full list of current and proposed releases is on my Department's website and on the Public Register.

Once a GM crop has Europe-wide consent for placing on the market (Part C), there is no requirement for prior notification of planting. However, only one such crop is currently grown in the UK, as part of the Farm Scale Evaluations programme. Under the agreement between the Government and the industry body, SCIMAC, the locations of the Evaluations will be published on my Department's website and the farmers involved will alert their neighbours.

Water Charging

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to alter the water charging regime to allow the use of council tax bands as an alternative to metering. [121025]

Mr. Mullin: Under the Water Industry Act 1999, companies must produce charges schemes, which include details of the basis on which they wish to charge for water and sewerage services to homes. Schemes are subject to approval by the Director General of Water Services.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has issued guidance to the Director General on the approval of schemes for companies operating wholly or mainly in England. In considering whether or not to approve a new basis of unmeasured charging, key factors are the transitional effects of any change, any proposals for managing such effects and the impact of the new basis of charging on different groups, particularly vulnerable customers. Because of the potential social impacts on customers, the Director should not approve the widespread introduction of new unmeasured charging arrangements, without full consultation with the Secretary of State. There is no statutory bar on such arrangements being based on council tax. The Government will continue to consider any proposals that come forward provided that they address the key factors.

The Secretary of State's guidance under the 1999 Act and other background on water charging policy is set out in "Water Industry Act 1999—Delivering the Government's Objectives" published on 3 February, a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

Lone Parents

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many lone parents aged under 18 years (a) are living in semi-supervised accommodation and (b) have lone tenancy of a council house. [121060]

Mr. Mullin: The only information currently available centrally is for new lettings of supported accommodation by Registered Social Landlords. In England from April 1998 to September 1999 there were 276 such lettings to lone parents under the age of 18.

As part of the follow-up to the Social Exclusion Unit report on Teenage Pregnancy, local authorities are being asked to carry out an audit of the provision of and need for semi-independent housing with support for 16 and 17-year-old lone teenage parents in their area.

Raptors

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many licences under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 for the removal of peregrine have been issued in each of the last five years for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement. [121117]

Mr. Meacher: This information is published in annual reports submitted by my Department, on behalf of the United Kingdom, to the European Commission, to meet the requirements of Article 9(3) of the European Community Directive on the Conservation of Wild Birds (79/409/EEC). These reports provide the reasons for each derogation made under Article 9 and therefore contain details of all licences issued under the 1981 Act, including any for the removal of peregrine.

The most recent report, the eighteenth, was published in January 2000 and covers the period 1 January—31 December 1998. It contains details of about 230 derogations in relation to peregrines for a variety of reasons, such as research and teaching. The majority do not involve permanent removal. As in previous years, the report will be made available in the House Libraries.

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received following the publication of the report of the UK Raptor Working Group; and if he will make a statement. [121116]

Mr. Meacher: My Department has received a number of representations on the report of the Raptor Working Group from a range of organisations. I welcome the publication of this report and its recommendations and hope it will help provide an integrated solution to the problems presented by birds of prey to game bird managers and pigeon fanciers. My Department will shortly be seeking English Nature's advice on the implementation in England of the report's recommendations in light of these representations.

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions which organisations tendered for the project, "A Study into the Raptor Predation of Domestic Pigeons", published in March; which organisation was awarded the tender; and what the qualifications were of the individuals who researched and wrote the study. [121118]

Mr. Meacher: In 1995 my Department let a research contract to assess the impact of raptor predation on pigeons and to investigate the effectiveness of non-lethal deterrents.

Tenders for the research contract were received from the Royal Agricultural College and the Hawk and Owl Trust. The contract was awarded to the Hawk and Owl Trust on the basis that they provided the best and most cost-effective methodology for investigating the extent of predation.

The research was undertaken and the report written by Hawk and Owl Trust members who have had a long history of involvement in various aspects of raptor ecology and research. They also have an extensive knowledge and experience of various aspects of survey work and are authors of numerous books, papers and articles on related topics.

Air Traffic Control

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when all the air traffic controller posts in NATS will be filled. [121296]

Mr. Mullin: The three vacancies in NATS Airports Services operations are expected to be filled by the middle of June. There are currently no shortages of controllers in NATS Area Control operations.

Hydrocarbons

Mr. Derek Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is his estimate of the quantity of hydrocarbons in industrial use in the UK (a) in total and (b) by each standard industrial sector classification. [120428]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 8 May 2000]: This information is not currently available to the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions and could not be collated without incurring disproportionate cost.

Hydrocarbons are common organic compounds, examples of which include natural gas; butane; propane; petroleum, diesel fuels, diesel oils, motor oils, motor fuels, marine oils, marine fuels, hydraulic fluids, crude oil, lubricating oils. As their type and application are so widely varied the collection of this information would prove extremely resource intensive.

Correspondence

Mr. McLoughlin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the hon. Member for West Derbyshire will receive a reply to his letter of 20 March about the Orange Badge Scheme for disabled drivers. [121443]

Mr. Hill: I responded to the hon. Member on Tuesday 9 May.

Exeter-Waterloo Line

Mr. Ashdown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans the Government have to alter the rail franchise which covers the Exeter to Waterloo Line; and if he will make a statement. [121225]

Mr. Hill: The Franchising Director has announced that he is considering replacement of the existing South West Trains franchise with an option to include or exclude Exeter to Waterloo services. This is one of a number of alterations being considered to the existing franchise map, but on which no firm decisions have yet been taken.

Standard Spending Assessment

Mr. Ashdown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the standard spending assessment per head of population for each English local authority for the most recent year for which information is available, ranked in descending order of allocated expenditure per head; and if he will make a statement. [121307]

Ms Armstrong: Two tables have been placed in the Library. The first table gives the 2000–01 Standard Spending Assessments (SSAs), the mid-98 population estimate and the SSA per head, together with the ranking for education authorities. The second table provides similar information for shire districts. The tables have been sorted and ranked in descending order of SSA per head. It would be inappropriate to compare shire districts with education authorities since they have vastly different responsibilities.

Pollution Prevention and Control

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representation he has received on the implementation of the Integrated Pollution Prevention and Control Directive; and if he will make a statement. [120453]

Mr. Hill: Copies of representations, unless marked confidential, are kept on the Department's files where they may be viewed. The Department has just issued its fifth consultation paper on the implementation of the Integrated Pollution Prevention and Control Directive. This includes a summary of the representations from the fourth consultation paper.

Representations from previous consultation papers have been received from:

Academic Organisations
Central Government
Consultants
Environmental Groups Industry
Legal Establishments
Local Government
Private Individuals
Trade Associations.

DEFENCE

Correspondence

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what reason he has not replied to the letter from the hon. Member for Twickenham of 17 August 1999 regarding conditions of service of members of the TA. [120989]

Mr. Spellar: I wrote to the hon. Member on 9 May.

Armed Services (Egg Suppliers)

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proportion of (a) eggs and (b) egg products purchased for the armed services in the last year for which figures are available were of British origin. [121352]

Dr. Moonie: The supply of food for the Armed Forces is contracted out to "3663". They advise that 100 per cent. of the eggs and egg products supplied to our forces based in the UK in the 12 month period ending March 2000 were of British origin. Supplies of eggs and egg products for our forces based overseas, which make up approximately 7 per cent. of the total requirement, were in the main sourced locally.

Garrison Churches, Aldershot

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the future of the three garrison churches in Aldershot. [120932]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 8 May 2000]: A study is under way to consider the redevelopment of the Aldershot Garrison and this will encompass all the buildings, including the churches. Any proposal concerning the Garrison Churches will be discussed with the relevant bodies prior to any decision being made.

Trident

Laura Moffatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the latest estimate of the cost of the Trident acquisition programme; and if he will make a statement. [121749]

Mr. Hoon: The current estimate of the total acquisition cost of the Trident programme, with payments already made expressed at the prices and exchange rates actually incurred and future spend at the current financial year exchange rate (the hybrid estimate), is now £9,745 million. Leaving aside the effects of price inflation (+£12 million), there has been a real cost reduction since last year of £23 million. Expenditure on the Trident acquisition programme to 30 September 1999 represented some 96 per cent. of this estimate. If all expenditure, past and projected, is brought up to the current year's economic conditions (the non-hybrid estimate) the estimate is £13,170 million.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Departmental Communications Systems

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to modernise his Department's communications systems. [121806]

Mr. Robin Cook: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office will today sign a contract with Global Crossing to provide a new telecommunications network and associated telecommunications services. The contract has been negotiated as part of the Private Finance Initiative, and will run for a 10 year period. The projected Net Present Value of the contract is £106 million. The total cost of the contract over the 10 year period is projected at £165 million.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Procurement (British Goods)

Mr. Baker: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission, what the policy is of the House in respect of public procurement and buying British goods; and what changes there have been in this policy since May 1997. [120823]

Mr. Kirkwood: The policy of the House is to procure all works, services and supplies in accordance with the relevant European Public Procurement Directives which ensures that British companies are given equal opportunity to secure House business.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Disability Legislation Compliance Cost

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what studies have been undertaken into the compliance costs for (a) further and (b) higher education of their forthcoming involvement in disability discrimination legislation. [119320]

Mr. Wicks [holding answer 18 April 2000]: The Government issued a consultation document on 17 March covering how disability rights in education might be implemented. The consultation period ended on 28 April. The costs of compliance in further and higher education will be estimated in the light of an analysis of responses to the document.

Higher Education (Access)

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to widen access to higher education. [121618]

Mr. Blunkett: My Department already has a range of initiatives to increase participation of disadvantaged groups. For instance, through the Excellence in Cities programme we are giving 5,000 gifted and talented 16 and 17-year-olds a taste of university life this summer. I can confirm that we will be providing new bursaries, worth up to £1,000 a year, that will give those from disadvantaged backgrounds the extra financial incentive and confidence they need to embark on a higher education course. These bursaries, which will be introduced from next year, will be known as "opportunity bursaries". However, more action is required if we are to extend the opportunities of higher education to all those capable of benefiting from it.

Today, I am pleased to announce a further package of measures that will open up new horizons to people from disadvantaged groups. This package includes:

a further £4 million to help recruit and retain bright students from areas with records of low participation in higher education. The money will add to the £18 million already available to help high achievers from these areas; extension of disabled student allowances of up to £5,000 a year to post-graduate students; and a grant of £63,000 to support a number of initiatives by the Sutton Trust. Both these measures and existing initiatives will become part of a concerted access drive that will enable those traditionally excluded from higher education to take advantage of a university education.

Further Education Corporations (Mergers)

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list in date order mergers between further education corporations since April 1993, specifying whether each amounted to a transfer or merger of undertakings. [121301]

Mr. Wicks: There are two types of mergers: the first is a single dissolution where one further education corporation is dissolved and its property, rights and liabilities are transferred to another corporation; and the second is where two or more corporations are closed and their property, rights and liabilities are transferred to a new corporation. The name of the continuing or new corporation, as the case may be, may also change at the time of the merger.

The table lists all mergers between further education corporations since 1 April 1993.

Education Funding (Somerset)

Mr. Ashdown: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what is his latest estimate for real spending on secondary schools in Somerset for each year from 1992–93 to 2000–01; and if he will make a statement; [121222]

(2) what is his estimate of real spending per pupil in secondary schools in Somerset for each year from 1992–93 to 2000–01, expressed in 1998–99 prices; and if he will make a statement. [121223]

Ms Estelle Morris: Spending on secondary schools in Somerset, and on a per pupil basis, from 1992–93 to 1998–99, the latest year for which this information is available, is set out in the table. The figures are based on Net Institutional Expenditure and expressed at 1998–99 prices.

[121224]

Ms Estelle Morris: The following tables show, for 1999–2000, (a) the 20 local education authorities with the least proportion of pupils gaining five or more passes at grades A to C in GCSE examinations and (b) the 20 local education authorities with the highest central administration costs (i) per pupil and (ii) in relation to their total education budget.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Minimum Wage

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will estimate the impact on the cost of departmental salaries were the national minimum wage for all ages to be raised to (a) £4, (b) £4.20 and (c) £4.50 per hour. [119865]

Mr. Alan Johnson [holding answer 20 April 2000]: The impact on the cost of departmental salaries were the national minimum wage for all ages to be raised to:

(a) £4 per hour would be £258;

(b) £4.20 per hour would be £6,356 and

(c) £4.50 per hour would be £23,722.

These figures relate to DTI Headquarters' Directorates only. I have asked the Chief Executives of the Department's agencies to respond to the hon. Member directly.

The information in respect of Non-Departmental Public Bodies could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Letter from J. S. Holden to Mr. Andrew Welsh, dated 9 May 2000:

I have been asked to reply to your recently tabled Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in respect of Companies House Executive Agency.

No one in Companies House is paid below the current minimum wage, but if it were increased the impact to our salaries would be as follows:

(a) Increase of £45,202 should the minimum wage be increased to £4 per hour

(b) Increase of £103,278 should the minimum wage be increased to £4.20 per hour

(c) Increase of £205,160 should the minimum wage be increased to £4.50 per hour.

Letter from David Hendon to Mr. Andrew Welsh, dated 9 May 2000:

I am replying to your question on behalf of the Radiocommunications Agency. Raising the minimum wage to £4, £4.20, or £4.50 an hour would have no impact on the Radiocommunications Agency's salary bill.

Letter from Peter Joyce to Mr. Andrew Welsh, dated 9 May 2000:

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has asked me to reply to your question about the estimated impact on the cost of departmental salaries of The Insolvency Service were the national minimum wage for all ages to be raised to (a) £4, (b) £4.20) and (c) £4.50 per hour.

Based on the salaries of current staff in post, the estimated annual cost to The Insolvency Service would be (a) £26,028, (b) £52,994 and (c) £95,054.

Letter from T. M. Ridley to Mr. Andrew Welsh, dated 10 May 2000:

The Chairman has asked me to respond to Mr. Counsell's letter of 27th April.

For the Advisory Conciliation and Arbitration Service (ACAS), increases in the National Minimum Wage of £4, £4.20, or £4.50 per hour would have no effect on salary costs.

Letter from Alison Brimelow to Mr. Andrew Welsh dated 9 May 2000:

Parliamentary Question: 1999/1835

The estimate of the impact on the cost of Patent Office Agency salaries were the national minimum wage for all ages to be raised to £4, £4.20 or £4.50 per hour, would be £8,000, £34,000 and £73,000 respectively.

Letter from Ian Jones to Mr. Andrew Welsh, dated 9 May 2000:

You tabled a Parliamentary Question on 18 April 2000 to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry concerning the impact on departmental salaries if the National Minimum Wage were raised to £4, £4.20 & £4.50. I have been asked to reply in respect of the Employment Tribunals Service (ETS) which is an executive agency of the DTI.

The approximate cost to ETS if the national minimum wage for all ages were raised is as follows:

Hourly increase	Annual basic rate	Total cost
£4 per hour	£8,736	£669
£4.20 per hour	£9,173	£3,312
£4.50 per hour	£9,828	£11,212

If there is further information you would like to have, please let me know.

Letter from Seton Bennet to Mr. Andrew Welsh, dated 9 May 2000:

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has asked me to reply on behalf of NWML to your question regarding the impact on the cost of Departmental salaries were the national minimum wage for all ages to be raised to (a) £4, (b) £4.20 and (c) £4.50 per hour.

This would have zero impact on the cost of salaries at the National Weights and Measures Laboratory as we have no staff paid at national minimum wage levels.

Miners' Pensions

Mr. Stevenson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the pension rights of miners dismissed following the 1984 dispute, with particular reference to (a) those dismissed who had their dismissal confirmed on appeal, (b) those dismissed who won their appeal against dismissal and (c) those dismissed who made no appeal. [120916]

Mrs. Liddell: The Coalfield Task Force, established by my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister, recommended that the DTI review the pension entitlements of men who were not reinstated following their dismissal during the 1984–85 miners' strike. I shall shortly be issuing a document which will put forward proposals for addressing these questions.

OECD Anti-bribery Convention

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he has taken to incorporate the OECD Anti-bribery Convention into UK law. [121026]

Mr. Caborn: The United Kingdom ratified the OECD Convention on Combating the Bribery of Foreign Public Officials on the basis of existing anti-corruption legislation, in particular, the 1906 Prevention of Corruption Act.

My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will shortly publish the Government's proposals for reform of the law of corruption, which are designed to update existing legislation, taking account of the UK's obligations under the OECD Convention and other international initiatives aimed at eradicating corruption.

Companies House

Ms Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 2 May 2000, Official Report, column 25W, concerning Companies House, what the results were of the systematic evaluation carried out of Capita's performance in the years (a) 1996–97, (b) 1997–98 and (c) 1998–99; what percentage of their targets Capita reached; and in what areas. [121125]

Dr. Howells: Capita's performance against the public target is to answer at least 90 per cent. of all incoming telephone calls to the Companies House inquiry unit within 20 seconds.

For the periods:

(a) January-June 1997 the result was 53.5 per cent.

(b) July 1997-June 1998 the result was 95 per cent.

(c) June 1998-July 1999 the result was 96.5 per cent.

No performance data are available from the commencement of the contract on 1 July 1996 to 31 December 1996, as during this period a new telephone system was being installed which precluded monitoring taking place.

Liquid Petroleum Gas

Ms Atherton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what powers OFGEM has with regard to monitoring and regulating the supply of bottled liquid petroleum gas; and if he will make a statement. [121084]

Mrs. Liddell: The Gas Act 1986, as amended, which set up the gas regulatory bodies, exempts and excepts LPG from its provisions. Therefore, LPG does not fall within the remit of the gas regulator. However, LPG is subject to UK competition law. Responsibility for possible consideration of anti-competitive practices in the market lies with the Director General of Fair Trading.

Radio Frequencies (Mobile Phones)

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what criteria are used by Her Majesty's Government to prioritise the use of radio frequencies for emergency transmissions. [121361]

Ms Hewitt: Radio frequencies are set aside specifically for emergency service use. The emergency services have priority within those frequency bands and no criterion other than being an emergency service is used.

Ex-directory Telephone Numbers

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will take measures to ensure that ex-directory telephone numbers are not commercially available; and if he will make a statement. [121350]

Ms Hewitt: The formulation and enforcement of policy on the privacy of ex-directory telecoms customers are matters for the Data Protection Commissioner and Oftel. It is important to note that being an ex-directory customer does not guarantee that unsolicited calls will never be received. Ex-directory status means that a number will never be quoted or called up by BT's or any other telecoms company's directory inquiries operators nor will details of the customer be listed in the Phonebook.

However, telemarketing companies can use other sources of information to contact people. These sources may contain information given by customers completing coupons for special offers, magazine and catalogue tear-off slips and other promotional questionnaires and flyers where the customer has not specified that such information is not to be disclosed.

Oil

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the recent research by the International Energy Agency on future supplies and prices of oil; and if he will make a statement. [121421]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 9 May 2000]: The International Energy Agency's (IEA) latest "World Energy Outlook (1998)" considers energy demand and supply for 10 world regions over the period to 2020 and concludes that world oil production from conventional sources could peak around 2015. This would result in a transfer from conventional oil to unconventional oil (for additional supplies) and might produce a rise in oil prices. The IEA's conclusions fall roughly in the middle of a range of projections from researchers which, at the extremes, envisage oil production peaking as early as 2005, or as late as 2050.

The IEA is currently preparing its "World Energy Outlook 2000", and hopes to publish this document in November 2000. My officials have been in contact with their IEA colleagues and I understand that some changes will be made to the methodology adopted by the IEA which will further improve the value of their research into future world energy demand and supply.

Coal Industry (State Aids)

Mr. Clapham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when and how the consultation procedure on coal state aid that he referred to in his statement on Energy Policy on 17 April will take place. [121748]

Mrs. Liddell: I have today placed in the Library a consultation document setting out proposals for a coal subsidy scheme. The consultation document is also available on the DTI's internet site at www.dti.gov.uk\consultations\

Staff Bonuses (Millennium Period)

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much his Department, its agencies and associated public bodies spent in total on extra bonuses above usual payments for staff working over the New Year period; what are the (a) maximum and (b) minimum bonuses paid; how many people received the (i) maximum and (ii) minimum payments; and if he will make a statement. [104490]

Dr. Howells [pursuant to his reply, 1 February 2000, c. 531–32W]: The information requested for the headquarters Department is now available. The total amount paid as Millennium extras was £27,430 to 100 staff. Two members of staff received the maximum payment of £1,040 and seven received the minimum payment of £65.

Exports (EU)

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the value of goods exported to other EU countries in 1999; and what proportion of those goods were trans-shipped in Continental ports to go on to non-EU destinations. [121410]

Dawn Primarolo: I have been asked to reply.

HM Customs & Excise are the Department responsible for collecting trade statistics on the movement of goods with other countries.

The value of goods exported to other EC countries in 1999 was £96.85 billion. Where goods are moved in transit through other EC countries en route to non-EC countries, exporters are required to report the country of final destination and such goods will not be counted as EC trade.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Lloyds TSB

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what was the outcome of her Department's recent legal action against Lloyds TSB. [120915]

Mr. Foulkes: Legal action against Lloyds TSB is still proceeding and it would therefore be inappropriate to comment on this matter at present.

Pitcairn Islands

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what subsidies were paid by the Government to the Pitcairn Islands in each year from 1989–90 to 1999–2000; what is the estimated expenditure for 2000–01; what control the Government exercise over how such subsidy is spent by the Pitcairn authorities; what is the Government's policy towards the level and maintenance of subsidy and bilateral aid to the Pitcairn Islands; and if she will make a statement. [121140]

Mr. Foulkes: HMG do not give revenue subsidy to the Pitcairn Government. Last year their Government spent £31,000 subsidising electricity and shipping and freight charges. Figures for previous years are not readily available. An analysis of Pitcairn's financial situation has concluded that Pitcairn will exhaust its Investment Fund (income mainly derived from the sale of postage stamps), without remedial action. Therefore, the Island Council has decided that it should remove subsidies while making provision for vulnerable people.

Our Department is consulting the Island Council and the Commissioner for Pitcairn on a medium term financial framework which will look at ways of increasing revenue from areas such as tourism, niche food products, and the issuing of fishing licences.

HMG have recently paid for the refurbishment of all the public buildings on the island, a project to market Pitcairn honey and the upgrading of the electricity distribution network.

We have also approved a £0.5 million contribution to the proposed "Hill of Difficulty" road which our Department is co-financing with the European Commission.

SCOTLAND

Birth Certificates

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland for what purposes his Department requires a birth certificate to be furnished by (a) employees, (b) contractors, (c) those applying for employment and contracts and (d) other persons. [120314]

Dr. Reid: The Scotland Office requires the production of a birth certificate or similar documentary evidence for one or more of the following reasons:

Proof of identity

Proof of eligibility under the Civil Service nationality rules

Proof of age.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Domestic Violence

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many incidents of domestic violence the police were called out to deal with in (a) 1970, (b) 1980 and (c) 1999; and what the cost was to public funds. [120658]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The information requested is not available.

The latest available estimate of domestic violence incidents recorded by the police, obtained from Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary 1998–99 Annual Statistical Return, is that there were approximately 355,000 such incidents in that year in England and Wales.

Another source of information on domestic violence is the British Crime Survey. This suggests that the actual prevalence of domestic violence is significantly higher. For the years 1981, 1991, 1993, 1995 and 1997 the estimated number of domestic violence incidents were as follows:

Thousand

Year	1981	1991	1993	1995	1997
All incidents	290	538	1,179	992	835
Reported incidents	57	126	271	296	220

Changes in the extent to which respondents are willing to divulge their experience may have influenced these trends.

The costs of police operations concerning domestic violence are not collected centrally. However, a report by Professor Elizabeth Stanko and others, "Counting the costs; estimating the impact of domestic violence in the London Borough of Hackney", was published by Crime Concern in 1998. This estimated the total cost in 1996 to the public sector of providing services for women and children facing domestic violence in Hackney at around £90 per annum per household. A copy of this report has been placed in the Library.

Racial Incidents

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many London borough councils have developed systems with the local police to combat racial incidents within their borough. [121119]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis informs me that all 32 London boroughs have Community Safety Units which are the focal point of liaison between the police and local councils in relation to racial incidents.

Drug-related Deaths

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will fund the National Programme on Substance Abuse Deaths publication entitled "Drug-related Deaths" as reported by coroners in England and Wales. [121263]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Government are currently reviewing data collection requirements in relation to drug-related deaths and it would be premature to take a decision on the funding of the database maintained by the National Programme on Substance Abuse Deaths while this review is ongoing.

Life-term Prisoners

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners serving life terms in United Kingdom jails have served (a) more than 25 years, (b) more than 30 years, (c) more than 35 years and (d) more than 40 years; and how many such prisoners there are in total. [121262]

Mr. Boateng: Responsibility for persons detained in prisons in Scotland and Northern Ireland lies with the First Minister of the Scottish Executive and the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, respectively.

As at 31 March 2000, a total of 4,469 persons were serving life sentences in prisons in England and Wales. A breakdown of these inmates, showing the time elapsed since reception under sentence, is given in the table. Prisoners who had been released on licence and subsequently recalled are included in the statistics. Such time spent on licence is included in the calculation of the time since sentenced.

Life sentence prisoners held in prisons in England and Wales on 31 March 2000, by interval since reception under sentence

Time since sentenced [1]	Number
Up to 25 years	4,303
Over 25 up to 30 years	97
Over 30 up to 35 years	50
Over 35 up to 40 years	11
Over 40 years	8
All life sentence prisoners	4,469

[1] Including any time spent on release under licence but excluding any time spent on remand before sentencing.

Penalties

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the (a) minimum and (b) maximum penalty for (i) violent demonstration and (ii) destruction of private property. [121347]

Mr. Charles Clarke: There is no specific offence of violent demonstration. Section 1 of the Public Order Act 1986 prescribes a maximum penalty of 10 years imprisonment for the offence of riot which involves the use, or threat, of unlawful violence for common purpose such as to cause fear for personal safety. It can only be committed where 12 or more people so act. Under section 2, similar behaviour committed by three or more people (violent disorder) is punishable with a maximum penalty of five years imprisonment. Section 3 relates to similar behaviour where only one or two people are involved (affray). The maximum penalty for this offence is three years imprisonment.

The destruction of private property would normally amount to criminal damage. The maximum penalty for criminal damage is 10 years imprisonment.

There are no minimum penalties for these offences.

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the (a) minimum and (b) maximum penalty for dousing a person in petrol and setting fire to them. [121345]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The penalties available would depend upon the offence charged. A person convicted of attempted murder would face a maximum penalty of life imprisonment. If the victim died, this could result in a conviction for murder, for which the mandatory sentence is life imprisonment. A conviction for causing grievous bodily harm with intent would also carry a maximum penalty of life imprisonment.

There are no minimum penalties for these offences.

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the (a) minimum and (b) maximum penalty for breaking and entering for the purpose of (a) theft and (b) an offence against the person. [121346]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The behaviour described would be charged as burglary. The maximum penalty for burglary is 14 years imprisonment. Additionally, for those convicted of a third domestic burglary, there is now a mandatory minimum sentence of three years imprisonment.

Radio (Emergency Services)

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from the emergency services concerning the cost to them of proposed changes to radio channels. [121337]

Mr. Charles Clarke [holding answer 9 May 2000]: The spectrum currently used by the police and fire services for radio communications has serious limitations and is the key reason why we arranged for the provision of new spectrum. The plan is that emergency services will use high quality spectrum, released at no cost by the Norther Atlantic Treaty Organisation, which will enable emergency services radio systems to function more efficiently than that provided by current schemes. We are achieving this by the introduction of the new Public Safety Radio Communications Service. We are doing so in accordance with an internationally agreed harmonized plan for use of Public Safety radio spectrum.

Both the Association of Chief Police Officers and the Association of Police Authorities have concluded that the Public Safety Radio Communications Project (PSRCP) meets technical requirements and offers value for money at a national level. However, a number of Police Forces and Police Authorities have raised the question of affordability of the PSRC Service.

I have also received various representations from the Fire Service about future radio communications and control room requirements, including views on costs and on their participation in the PSRC Service.

Policing (Somerset)

Mr. Ashdown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of police numbers in Somerset in March 2001; and if he will make a statement. [121227]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I understand from the Chief Constable that he currently projects 3,030 officers available for ordinary duty at the end of March 2001 for the Avon and Somerset Constabulary. The Chief Constable is unable to provide a figure for only Somerset. He distributes resources between the eight territorial divisions according to need and operational priorities.

Mr. Ashdown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what conclusions about the adequacy of central Government support for policing in Somerset he has reached on the basis of recent research commissioned by his Department into the costs of policing in rural areas; and if he will make a statement. [121226]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) on 21 February 2000, Official Report, columns 118–19W.

Gammahydroxybutrate

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the reclassification of Gammahydroxybutrate as a drug rather than as a medicine. [120437]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Further to my reply of 28 February 2000, Official Report, column 107W, I can report that Gammahydroxybutrate has now been referred to the Scientific Committee of the European Monitoring Centre for Drugs and Drugs Addiction for a formal risk assessment.

Anti-drugs Strategy

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what account he has taken in implementing the Government's anti-drugs strategy of the relationship between drug-related offending by women and the number of women sentenced to imprisonment. [120439]

Mr. Charles Clarke: In 1998, 968 females and 9,777 males were given an immediate custodial sentence for drugs offences (Great Britain). Statistics on drug-related offences are not collected by the Home Office, but by a programme of research at Cambridge University on behalf of the Home Office. This involves drug testing of arrestees, and indicates a strong connection between drug misuse, particularly heroin and crack/cocaine, and crime, and suggests that about one third of all property crime is committed in order to buy these drugs. The initial findings also showed that for most drug types, female arrestees were as likely, if not more likely, than males to test positive and that females were significantly more likely than males to test positive for opiates.

Two key objectives of the Government's anti-drugs strategy are to reduce levels of repeat offending among drug misusing offenders and to increase the participation of problem drug misusers, including prisoners, in drug treatment programmes which have a positive impact on health and crime. This relates to men and women, but the strategy recognises that specific support services may be needed for certain groups including women. Counselling, Assessment, Referral, Advice, Throughcare (CARAT) services, in place in every prison, will be tailored towards the prisoner populations in each establishment. Also, research is to be undertaken to look further into the issue of women and drugs.

Cannabis

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of claims in the Police Foundation's report on the results of cannabis decriminalisation in the Netherlands. [120448]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The committee of inquiry set up by the Police Foundation has produced a thorough report with a large number of recommendations and the Government will give it careful attention. However, the Government have made it clear that they do not support the Inquiry's recommendations on the re-classification or depenalisation of cannabis.

The Government have a clear and consistent view about the damage which drugs can cause to individuals, their families and the wider community, the link between drugs and crime—and the corresponding need to maintain firm controls. The Government are opposed to any lessening of controls on currently illicit drugs but favour a wide-ranging approach—we see a need for a balance of policies involving supply reduction, demand reduction and harm reduction.

The Police Foundation's report acknowledges that there are significant contradictions between Dutch drugs policy—under which small-scale possession and supply of cannabis remains illegal but the laws are not enforced—and international agreements. The Preamble to the Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs 1961, states that effective measures against abuse of narcotic drugs require co-ordinated and universal action and that such action calls for international co-operation guided by the same principles and aimed at common objectives. The Government support these principles and have no intention of breaching their obligations under the 1961 United Nations drugs convention which commit the international community to working together against the illicit drug trade. It naturally follows from this that the Government also have no intention of allowing for the systematic non-enforcement of the law.

HEALTH

Continence

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what plans he has to issue NHS guidance on continence in place of the existing guidelines; [120751]

(2) what action he is taking to ensure national minimum standards in the NHS in dealing with continence problems; [120752]

(3) what plans he has to monitor the provision of services for people with continence problems; and if he will make a statement. [120753]

Mr. Hutton: "Good Practice in Continence Services" was issued on 19 April 2000. This guidance suggests targets for primary and community teams, health authorities and National Health Service trusts. It includes appropriate references to the NHS Performance Assessment Framework, which is used to plan and monitor the delivery of services.

A National Service Framework for Older People is currently being developed. This will supplement the guidance on continence services by placing it in the wider context of improving NHS services for older people.

EU Food and Veterinary Office

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement about proposals to increase the number of inspectors at the European Union's Food and Veterinary Office. [120364]

Ms Stuart: The annual report of the European Commission's Food and Veterinary Office (FVO) for 1999 gave no indication that there are further proposals to increase the number of its inspectors. It did, however, report that during 1998 and 1999 the number of its inspectors had more than doubled to 87. This was as a result of the FVO's increased responsibilities, in both member states and third countries exporting to member states, for the protection of consumer health.

Fostered Children

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many children there were in foster homes in (a) 1970, (b) 1980 and (c) 1999; and of these, how many were from (i) broken families, (ii) single parent family units and (iii) intact families. [120675]

Mr. Hutton: The information available is given in the table:

Children in care/looked after in foster placements, in England, years ending 31 March 1970, 1980, 1999

	Boarded out/foster placements
Year ending 31 March	Number	Rate per 10,000 population [1]
1970	28,900	23
1980	35,200	27
1999	36,200	32

[1] Aged under 18

Notes:

1. All numbers of children have been rounded to the nearest hundred.
2. Figures for children looked after in this table exclude agreed series of short-term placements.
3. Figures for 1970 were collected under the provisions of the Children Act 1948.
4. Figures for 1980 were collected under the provisions of the Children and young Persons Act 1969.
5. Figures for 1999 were collected under the provisions of the Children Act 1989.
6. The Department of Health does not collect data on the family background of children looked after.

PTB Staff

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to pay the PTB staff for the 1998–99 pay year. [120914]

Mr. Denham: Professional and Technical B staff received a 2 per. cent. pay increase from 1 April 1998 rising to 3.8 per. cent. from 1 December 1998.

Generic Medicine Pricing

Mr. Fabian Hamilton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what assessment he has made of the likely effect of the Government's proposals for generic medicine pricing on (a) the patient pack and (b) the availability of generic medicines; [121034]

(2) if pharmacists will be reimbursed for stocks of generic medicines bought under the old pricing regime. [121033]

Ms Stuart: Our proposals for setting maximum prices for generic medicines aim to protect the position of the National Health Service by correcting the effect of last year's price increases, while allowing reasonable returns to those in the supply chain. We believe that the proposed new prices, which are currently subject to consultation, should stimulate a good supply of generics, including patient packs, to the NHS.

Community pharmacists, along with other parties in the supply chain, have several months in which they can reduce their stockholdings before the proposed legislation requiring price cuts takes effect. In addition, reimbursement prices will not be brought into line with the new selling prices until the following month, thus providing a further time interval during which stocks can be run down and replaced with new stock at the lower price.

Neurological Diseases

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to make implant therapy for neurological diseases available to all NHS patients. [120761]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 4 May 2000]: Implant therapy can, in some patients, be highly beneficial for people with neurological conditions. However, it is a relatively new and developing field and the merits of this form of treatment compared with traditional therapies have not yet been thoroughly tested. It is for a patient's neurologist to decide if implant therapy would be beneficial given the circumstances of each individual patient.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the review on implant therapy for neurological diseases will be completed; and if he will make a statement. [120760]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 4 May 2000]: There is some evidence that neurostimulation may help a small number of patients with severe Parkinson's Disease. There is no clear evidence however, about whether it is a clinically or cost effective alternative to another surgical technique (lesional surgery) or best medical treatment. In addition, there are three kinds of neurostimulation and at present the long-term safety of one type of stimulation (sub-thalamic) has yet to be established.

An independent assessment of the evidence is now required for the use of neurostimulator implants in the treatment of severe Parkinson's Disease. We are currently considering the best way to take this forward.

Pharmacists

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the Prescription Pricing Bureau will resume paying pharmacists for actual costs. [121120]

Ms Stuart: The Prescription Pricing Authority (PPA) continues to pay pharmacists for actual costs. The PPA is at present making balancing adjustments (which may be a credit or debit) to convert interim payments to payment of actual costs three months later than normal. Current forecasts indicated that this delay will reduce to two months by February 2001 and normal payment arrangements are expected to resume from September 2001.

Slimming Drugs

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for Health pursuant to his answer of 20 April 2000, Official Report, column 624W, on slimming drugs, upon what grounds the urgent advice of the Committee on the Safety of Medicines has been sought concerning the drug amfepramone. [121112]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 8 May 2000]: The Committee's advice was sought following the suspension by the European Court of the European Commission Decision to withdraw amfepramone products from the Community market. The Committee was asked to consider the public health implications of the reinstatement of the licences for amfepramone.

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the cost to the NHS of treatment for obesity that will arise from the withdrawal from the market of the drug phentermine and related products; and if he will make a statement. [121108]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 8 May 2000]: The decision to withdraw a product from the market is based on the safety and efficacy of that product and the associated impact on public health, not cost to the National Health Service. The decision to withdraw phentermine from the market was a European Commission Decision, with which the United Kingdom was obliged to comply, according to the legislation governing medicinal products in the European Union.

Carers

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many home carers there are in (a) Great Britain and (b) Scotland. [121326]

Mr. Hutton: The latest available information on informal carers shows that in 1995 the estimated number of informal carers in (a) Great Britain was 5.7 million and (b) Scotland was 741,000.

1995 General Household Survey.

Consultants

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what checks are undertaken to ensure that NHS employed consultants who also work in private practice are able properly to account for their time. [121455]

Ms Stuart: Any National Health Service consultant who does private work is expected to devote substantially the whole of their professional time to their NHS work. It is for employers and employees to agree the balance between private and NHS work. Their responsibilities for the clinical care of their NHS patients must come first. It is for NHS management locally to ensure that all consultants are fulfilling their contractual commitments, and to take action if these are not being met in individual cases.

A whole time consultant is permitted to have private practice earnings of up to 10 per cent. of their gross NHS salary. If asked by their employer, they must provide fully audited accounts showing their gross income from private practice. If their private practice income exceeds 10 per cent. of their NHS salary in two consecutive years, they have the option of a maximum part-time contract, which means that the consultant foregoes one eleventh of whole time salary, in return for the removal of the restrictions on private practice earnings. However, whether on a whole time or maximum part time contract, there is a clear contractual obligation to devote substantially the whole of their professional time to their NHS duties.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what checks are undertaken on the expense claims submitted by consultants working for the NHS. [121456]

Mr. Denham: The monitoring of expense claims submitted by consultants is a matter for individual employing bodies.

Meat Hygiene Service

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health for what reason the Meat Hygiene Service inspector, Mr. Yogarathnum, was suspended from his duties at the Mead Webber Abattoir at Eardisley and replaced on 10 April 2000 by Mr. Turner of the St. David's Veterinary Practice at Exeter. [121215]

Ms Stuart: On 10 April 2000 St. David's Farm and Equine Veterinary Practice, Exeter commenced provision of contract official veterinary surgeons (OVSs) to the Mead Webber abattoir at Eardisley on behalf of the Meat Hygiene Service (MHS). Prior to this Mr. Yogarathnum, a Meat Hygiene Service employee, had undertaken both the OVS and principal official veterinary surgeon (POVS) duties at the premises.

Mr. Yogarathnum was relieved of his OVS duties at the Mead Webber abattoir, in order to allow him to spend more time on his POVS duties in a number of plants in the area. This included remaining as POVS at the Mead Webber abattoir.

Mr. Turner is a partner of the St. David Farm's and Equine Veterinary Practice. While providing locum cover for the new OVS that he had appointed to the Mead Webber abattoir, he identified a number of deficiencies in the operations and structure of the premises to which he drew management's attention. As a result of these findings, the MHS Regional Director responsible for the Mead Webber abattoir visited the premises. He also discussed his concerns with plant management, Mr. Yogarathnum and the MHS meat inspection team. Mr. Yogarathnum was subsequently suspended, pending an investigation into his performance as POVS to the premises.

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what costs were incurred by the Meat Hygiene Service through the employment of Mr. Turner to inspect the Eardisley meat plant. [121216]

Ms Stuart: Mr. Turner is a partner of the St. David's Farm and Equine Veterinary Practice at Exeter. The practice was successful in its tender to supply Contract Official Veterinary Surgeons on behalf of the Meat Hygiene Service (MHS) to Mead Webber abattoir at Eardisley. The rate per hour quoted in their tender for the provision of Contract official veterinary surgeons (OVSs) to the plant was £24.98. On the basis that the OVS will be present at the plant for 21 hours (in line with previous OVS attendance), the total costs of providing contract OVSs to the plant is therefore £524.

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many Meat Hygiene Service veterinary meat inspectors were employed from 1995 to 10 April 2000 in the Mead Webber plant at Eardisley. [121217]

Ms Stuart: Between January 1997 and April 2000, fourteen official veterinary surgeons (OVSs) have carried out OVS duties on behalf of the Meat Hygiene Service at the Mead Webber plant at Eardisley. The vast majority of these provided locum cover for employed OVSs at the premises and as a consequence would only have spent a relatively short period of time in the plant.

In the time available it has not been possible to collate all of the information relating to the number of OVSs who worked at the plant between 1995 and December 1996, or the total number of meat inspection staff who have worked there between 1995 and April 2000. I will place a copy of this information in the Library when it is available.

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will take steps to ensure a new licence is issued to the Eardisley Abattoir. [121220]

Ms Stuart: No action to revoke the slaughterhouse licence No. 4103, issued on 4 March 1993 to The Abattoir, Eardisley, Hereford, has been taken. Revocation has not been recommended by the Licensing Authority (the Food Standards Agency) or its executive agency the Meat Hygiene Service, nor has it been requested by the abattoir operators (Mead Webber Ltd).

SOCIAL SECURITY

Social Fund

Mr. Dobbin: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people have applied for money from the Social Fund and how much money was issued in loans through the Social Fund, in each of the last three years in (a) Scotland, (b) Wales, (c) England and (d) North-West England. [120099]

Angela Eagle: The administration of the Social Fund is a matter for Alexis Cleveland, the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. She will write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Alexis Cleveland to Mr. Jim Dobbin, dated 9 May 2000:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking how many people have applied for money from the Social Fund and how much money was issued in loans through the Social Fund, in each of the last three years in (a) Scotland, (b) Wales, (c) England and (d) North-West England.

The figures are included in the attached table.

I hope this is helpful.

Notes:

1. Figures show the total number of all applications for budgeting loans and crisis loans. Individual customers may have made more than one application.
2. North-West England is defined as the area covered by the Benefits Agency Area Directorates 8 (North-West Coast) and 9 (Greater Manchester).
3. Some loans paid clerically, and adjustments between awards of loans and grants on review, are not recorded on the computer system. The figures do not therefore add up to total loans awarded for each year as published in the Social Fund Accounts.
4. 1999–2000 expenditure is provisional pending publication of the Social Fund Account.

Winter Fuel Payments

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what progress is being made in clearing the backlog of payments of winter fuel allowance to those who lost their original cheque. [120126]

Angela Eagle: The administration of winter fuel payments is a matter for Alexis Cleveland, Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. She will write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Alexis Cleveland to Mr. Vernon Coaker, dated 8 May 2000:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking what progress is being made in clearing the backlog of payments of winter fuel allowance to those who lost their original cheque.

The Benefits Agency's (BA) winter fuel team have made enquiries of their Mercia Area Directorate (AD5) which covers your constituency area. They advise that the question of replacing 13 girocheques is still outstanding pending further investigation.

Any winter fuel payments reported lost, missing or not received are treated in the same manner as other lost or missing payments and replaced accordingly. If a customer reports a lost, missing or not received girocheque to the local BA Office a form is completed by the customer stating the circumstances of the loss or non-receipt. This can be either completed at the office or posted to the customer. If posted the process of replacement takes a little longer allowing for postage times. When the form is returned an officer acting on behalf of the Secretary of State examines the information to consider a replacement.

I hope this is helpful.

Lone Parents

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the total number of lone parents on income support, broken down into those with children (a) below and (b) above school age, for each month since April 1992. [121036]

Mr. Bayley: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

As many lone parents have more than one child whose ages can be either above or below five years, figures have been provided for all three categories, i.e., lone parents with under fives only, lone parents with over fives only, and those parents with children in both categories.

4. Figures have been rounded to the nearest thousand.
5. Information on the numbers of lone parents claiming Income Support by age of child dependants is collected on a quarterly basis. It is therefore not possible to supply monthly figures.

ONE Service

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what reviews have been carried out to assess the success of the single work-focused gateway. [121100]

Angela Eagle: There will be a thorough evaluation of the ONE service, which will use a range of standard evaluation techniques; quantitative and qualitative research, operational research and cost-benefit analysis. The success of the pilots will be evaluated by comparing the outcomes for participants in the pilot areas with those for similar people from other, comparable areas. The evaluation will also include assessments about the effectiveness of ONE compared to the present system and it will compare data from the different model pilots to assess their relative effects.

Disability Living Allowance

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will set up an independent review of the workings of the appeals system against refusal and downgrading of disability living allowance applications; and if he will make a statement. [121196]

Angela Eagle: A full evaluation exercise is currently being carried out following the changes to the decision making and appeals procedures introduced last year. All areas affected by the changes are being monitored.

We are aware that the Benefits Agency is experiencing some problems in dealing with revisions and appeals on Disability Living Allowance and this is being addressed separately.

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the cost of extending the entitlement for new claims to disability living allowance to all those aged below 70 years. [119246]

Mr. Bayley [pursuant to his reply, 17 April 2000, c. 402W]: The estimated programme cost would be £350 million in 2001–02, rising to £400 million in 2002–03 and £500 million in 2003–04.

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 2 May 2000, Official Report, column 34W, on fraud savings, what are the abbreviated names of the initiatives and projects in full. [121280]

Interest Rates

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what have been since 1992 the rates of (a) income support for mortgage interest and (b) the bank base rate. [120380]

Mr. Bayley: From April 1992 until October 1995, the amount included for mortgage interest within the Income Support assessment for mortgage interest was determined by the actual interest rate charged by each claimant's lender. Since October 1995, the amount of Income Support allowed for mortgage interest has been determined by use of a Standard Interest Rate, limited by a maximum amount allowable. There are transitional arrangements applicable to people who were receiving help with mortgage interest at the point of change in October 1995.

Married Women (Reduced National Insurance Rate)

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will place in the Library a copy of leaflets produced by his Department in the late 1980s which offered guidance to married women on whether to revoke their election to pay a reduced rate of national insurance contributions. [120096]

Dawn Primarolo: I have been asked to reply.

The following leaflets have been placed in the Library:

NI1 "National Insurance Choices for Married Women" August 1989.

NP.32B "Retirement benefits for married women" revised July 1986.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make it his policy to compensate married women who received inaccurate advice from his Department about whether to revoke their decision to pay a reduced rate of national insurance contributions following the reform of national insurance contributions in 1989, and who as a result are receiving a lower rate of retirement pension. [120095]

Dawn Primarolo: In 1989, the Department of Social Security ran a publicity campaign to inform lower-paid women that they could be paying more in reduced-rate National Insurance contributions than if they paid at the standard rate because of structural changes to National Insurance contributions introduced in October that year. They were also reminded that they could revoke their elections to pay the married women's reduced rate if they wish to do so.

The Prime Minister: I have no immediate plans to do so.

Social Exclusion Unit

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement about the work of the Social Exclusion Unit. [120434]

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) on 3 May 2000, Official Report, columns 110–11W.

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 10 May. [121230]

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with Ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I will have further such meetings later today.

TREASURY

Capital Investment

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the level of capital investment in (a) oil and gas extraction, (b) other energy and water supply, (c) manufacturing, (d) distribution, (e) hotel and catering, (f) financial business services, (g) transport, (h) communications and (i) private dwellings since 1988. [120242]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from John Kidgell to Mr. Alan Simpson, dated 10 May 2000:

The Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS) has been asked to reply to your recent question on levels of capital investment since 1988. I am replying in the Director's absence.

Due to the introduction of a new European System of Accounts (ESA 95) the production of data on capital investment by industry has been postponed. The publication of these data is planned for the end of this year. The only information available is on investment in private (personal sector) dwellings and business investment in manufacturing industry (from 1994 only), which is given below (in £ million).

National Debt

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish for each year since 1970, the level of the United Kingdom national debt (a) in actual terms, (b) in constant money terms and (c) as a proportion of gross national product; and if he will publish, on the same basis, a projection of these figures for the next five years. [121197]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The table gives the figures requested.

Financial Services Access

Mr. Goggins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what action he is taking to encourage better access to financial services for low income households. [120452]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The general theme of the Treasury Policy Action Team (PAT 14) report on "Access to Financial Services" is that tackling financial exclusion requires the development of new financial services products and new ways to access them. There is no single solution: diversity and choice are the watchwords.

The Government have made clear their expectation that the banks and building societies will play their part in combating financial exclusion. In particular a number of banks already offer basic bank accounts with no overdrafts and no charges which are suitable for those on low incomes. All Banks have been asked to provide such accounts by October. The Post Office also has a key role to play in delivering a range of banking services. The Government are contributing almost £500 million to the capital costs of computerisation of the Post Office network. A number of banks and building societies have formed partnerships with the Post Office.

On 16 November 1999, I announced moves to boost credit unions which will provide a new central services organisation and changes to the regulation of credit unions to help them to deliver a more consistent and flexible service to their members.

Minimum Wage

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of households he estimates have gained from the minimum wage in each income decile; how much the average gain has been to (a) each earner and (b) each household in each income decile (i) in absolute terms and (ii) as a proportion of income; by what method his estimates were made; and if he will make a statement. [119827]

Dawn Primarolo: Collating this information requires complex technical modelling. I will write to the hon. Member with the relevant information as soon as possible placing a copy of my letter in the Library of the House.

Integrated Child Credit

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the integrated child credit were to be introduced on the basis of the illustrative structure shown in chart 2.6 of Tackling Poverty and Making Work Pay-Tax Credits for the 21 Century, how many children he estimates would be in families drawing (i) income support/JSA and the integrated child credit, (ii) employment tax credit and the integrated child credit, (iii) the integrated child credit only including the WFTC child credit element, and (iv) the integrated child credit only including the children's tax credit element only, including child benefit in all cases. [120392]

Dawn Primarolo: No estimates have been made of the number of families in these categories. The numbers in each group will depend on the detailed design of the integrated child credit and employment tax credit, on which decisions have not yet been taken as well as take-up. The table sets out estimates of the number of dependent children in families in receipt of either Income Support of income-based Jobseekers Allowance, Working Families and Disabled Person's Tax Credit or only getting the Children's Tax Credit in 2001.

Benefit/Tax Credit	Number of children
Income Support or income-based JSA	2½
Working Families or Disabled Person's Tax Credit	2½
Children's Tax Credit only	6

Tax Mixing

Mr. Jack: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many companies are known to the Inland Revenue as having offshore mixer companies. [120289]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 2 May 2000]: The number of groups using offshore companies to mix high and low taxed income varies year to year depending on the level of their UK and foreign profits, the need to pay dividends to their shareholders and their profit repatriation policies.

Missing National Insurance Numbers

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many new national insurance numbers sent out have gone missing since January 1999; what action has been taken to investigate missing national insurance numbers; and how many missing national insurance numbers have been traced to asylum seekers. [121057]

Dawn Primarolo: Working with the DSS we have in place a substantial programme of work involving continual routine activities and new projects, which between them aim to keep the risk and incidence of NINO abuse to the minimum.

This work will include rolling out the lessons from a pilot in Balham aimed at securing the gateway to obtaining a NINO.

In addition, we are also working with DSS to look at the way in which we manage accounts which might present risk.

Helplines

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many calls have been received by (a) the Working Families Tax Credit helpline and (b) the Disabled Person's Tax Credit helpline, in each month since January 1999; and what the salary levels are for those who work on each helpline. [121058]

Dawn Primarolo: The following table shows calls handled by the helplines. For Great Britain, they cover calls about Family Credit (FC) and Disability Working Allowance (DWA), as well as Working Families Tax Credit (WFTC) and Disabled Person's Tax Credit (DPTC). For Northern Ireland, the helplines were brought into operation for WFTC and DPTC in September 1999. No counts of earlier calls about FC or DWA are available for Northern Ireland.

The table also shows calls handled by the response line, which was open from September 1999 to January 2000, and again in April 2000. For months up to January 2000, these calls were handled by the private contractors engaged, or by recorded voice. (All but 10,000 of these calls were about WFTC.) For April 2000 the figure is of calls handled by recorded voice; no private contractors were engaged.

The high figure for March 2000 is explained by the particularly large number of awards approaching their renewal dates in that month.

The helpline operators are currently paid at annual rates of between £12,110 and £18,666.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the average percentage increase in real benefit unit net income between 1997–98 and 2000–01 of the 1.2 million children that his policies have lifted out of poverty. [121287]

Dawn Primarolo: Collating this information requires complex technical modelling. I will write to the hon. Member with the relevant information as soon as possible, placing a copy of my letter in the Library of the House.

Double Taxation Relief

Mr. Portillo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has altered his projections for the revenue yield from changes to double taxation relief and controlled foreign companies following representations from business since the Budget. [121063]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 5 May 2000]: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 19 April 2000, Official Report, columns 577–78W. The full year yield is not affected by the changes announced by the Inland Revenue Press Release 92/00 on 3 May 2000.

Working Families Tax Credit

Mr. Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the value of error by (a) officials and (b) claimants in respect of the working families tax credit in the last three years for which figures are available. [117035]

Dawn Primarolo: The overall value of known WFTC recoverable overpayments resulting from mistakes made by WFTC applicants for the period 1 October 1999 to 31 March 2000 is £93k. The overall value of known Family Credit recoverable overpayments resulting from mistakes made by Family Credit applicants for the corresponding period 1October 1998 to 31 March 1999 is £1.8 million.

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the costs to business will be of administering the working families tax credit from April 2000 to 31 March 2003. [121072]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 5 May 2000]: I refer the hon. Member to the regulatory impact assessment which was published and placed in the House Library in December 1999.

UK Reserves

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer by how much the United Kingdom's reserves have been reduced in value since the decision in July 1999 to sell gold and purchase euros, due to the fall in the value of that currency; and if he will make a statement. [121200]

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the net change in the value of the United Kingdom's reserves as a result of his decision to sell gold and buy euros. [121452]

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the financial consequences to date of exchanging UK gold bullion reserves for Euros. [121498]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The UK's programme of gold sales were part of a prudent medium term programme to restructure the reserves which aims to achieve a better balance in the Government's portfolio. There will be times when currencies depreciate and times when they appreciate. Having a diversified portfolio avoids being too exposed to any one asset.

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the current Bank of England reserves of euros; and how many euros have been purchased by the Bank of England since 1 January. [121268]

Mr. Gill: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total quantity of reserves held in (a) gold and (b) euros on 31 March 1999 and 31 March 2000. [121692]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Table 2 of the Quarterly Report on UK Official Holdings of Foreign Currency and Gold for the period October to December 1999, published on 2 March 2000, provides a breakdown of the size and composition of the United Kingdom's reserve holdings, including a currency breakdown. The Quarterly Report for the period January to March 2000 will be published on 2 June.

Employers' National Insurance Contributions

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the proposed reduction in the employers' national insurance contribution rate financed by the climate change levy. [121211]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 8 May 2000]: Pages 140 and 141 of the March 2000 Financial Statement and Budget Report give the details of national insurance contributions rates. A copy is in the Library of the House.

Tax Data

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the reduction in tax paid per year in cash terms, and as a percentage of total gross annual income, for each income decile group, resulting from increasing the 10p tax band on earnings by £100; and if he will make a statement. [120800]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 9 May 2000]: For taxpayers in 2000–01, the estimates for an increase in the starting rate limit are given in the table.

Income tax effect of extending the starting rate limit to £1,620 in 2000–01 [1,2]

[2] The estimates exclude an offsetting effect from the Working Families Tax Credit because this is allowed at family level and not at individual level.

Tax Returns (Internet)

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received from users of Apple Macintosh PCs in respect of internet filing of tax returns. [121333]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 9 May 2000]: The Inland Revenue has received 17 representations from people with Apple Macintosh PCs in respect of internet filing of tax returns.

Motor Insurance Premiums

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of trends in motor insurance premiums since 1996; and if he will make a statement. [121300]

Miss Melanie Johnson: None.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Climate Change Levy

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what compliance costs in relation to the climate change levy face each sector of the agricultural industry; and what assistance is being offered to each sector. [120244]

Ms Quin: Any compliance costs associated with the administration of the climate change levy will fall mainly on the energy suppliers who will have to amend their billing systems in order to accommodate the levy. More information is contained in the Regulatory Impact Assessment of the climate change levy prepared by Customs and Excise and it will be updated as appropriate to reflect any significant changes.

To ensure that the levy will be revenue neutral for the private sector as a whole, revenue collected by the levy will be recycled in full to all sectors of the UK economy through a 0.3 percentage point reduction in employers' NICs and through the provision of an additional £150 million to support energy efficiency measures, including the introduction of 100 per cent. first year capital allowances for energy saving instruments. In addition electricity generated from 'new' forms of renewable energy and in 'good quality' combined heat and power plants will be exempt from the levy. This will be of help to agricultural users of energy produced from these sources.

To assist energy intensive sectors defined as being those sites and installations covered by the EU Integrated Pollution Prevention and Control directive (IPPC), an 80 per cent. discount of the levy rates is being offered to those sectors that can come forward with proposals to make energy savings meeting the Government's criteria. In agriculture these sectors include pigs, poultry and sows.

In addition the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced in Budget 2000 that the Government intend to introduce a package of measures to help improve energy efficiency in the horticultural sector while protecting its competitiveness. Subject to State Aids clearance from the European Commission, this will include:

A special package of support for horticulture allocated from the energy efficiency fund. This package will aim to improve energy efficiency across the sector and will include activities such as the provision of site-specific advice for individual businesses.

An extension to the list of investments qualifying for enhanced capital allowances to include thermal screens. This will provide a further fiscal incentive for horticultural businesses to invest in energy saving technologies and:

A temporary 50 per cent. discount on the levy for a period of up to five years to the horticulture sector while the energy efficiency measures targeted at the sector take effect.

Forestry Commission Pension Scheme

Mr. Temple-Morris: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how the Forestry Commission Employees Pension Fund is funded; and how much public money was made available to it in each of the last three years for which figures are available. [120485]

Mr. Morley: The Forestry Commission Pension Scheme operates in the same way as the Principal Civil Service Pension Scheme. Prior to devolution, benefits were paid from the net grant in aid for forestry voted by Parliament. Net payments in each of the last three years, after allowing for receipts from employee contributions and transfers to and from other schemes were:

	£ million
1996–97	28.9
1997–98	26.5
1998–99	26.8

Once the devolution settlement is fully in place, the employers contributions which until now have been assessed only for internal Forestry Commission accounting purposes, will be paid from money provided by Parliament, the Scottish Parliament and the National Assembly for Wales. In 1998–99 this amounted to £6.4 million. The balance will continue to be paid from money provided by Parliament.

Strychnine Hydrochloride

Mr. Woolas: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to speed up the issuing of licences for the prescription of strychnine hydrochloride for mole eradication. [120654]

Ms Quin: Strychnine hydrochloride is a dangerous substance and strict controls are in place to regulate its circulation and use. Applications for permits to use it to kill moles are considered by MAFF's Regional Service Centres (RSCs), which issue the permit or refuse the application within 15 working days of receipt of the completed application. The established standard is quoted in the public statement of RSC customer service standards—"Commitment to Service".

During the 1999–2000 financial year, 98 per cent. of permits were issued within 15 working days despite an increase in applications of 14 per cent. from the previous year. We will continue to work and achieve the same standard in all cases.

CABINET OFFICE

Government (Public IT Access)

8. Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what steps she is taking to ensure that the modernising of Government programmes pays particular attention to the accessibility of Government Departments to the public using information technology. [120442]

Mr. Ian McCartney: Part of our e-government strategy is to increase the citizens choice of access to public services. The services that can be accessed are as follows:

General Information Obtained from Government, such as Employment Regulations

Personal information obtained from Government, like National Insurance records

Personal information supplied to Government, for example when changing address

Payment to Government

Payment from Government.

We have set a target that 100 per. cent. of dealings will be capable electronically by 2005.

Anti-drugs Strategy (Lancashire)

9. Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what progress has been made in the promotion of a holistic anti-drug abuse strategy in Lancashire. [120443]

Marjorie Mowlam: The Lancashire Drug Action Team is contributing to the Government's anti-drugs strategy by implementing a wide range of measures to address problems of drug misuse at local level. These include:

establishing a multi-agency approach towards identified areas of service provision across the county improving drugs education in schools working with Crime Prevention Partnerships and extending early intervention schemes for young people in the community—including six Arrest Referral schemes improving information systems, and addressing problems over waiting lists for treatment.

Genetically Modified Organisms

10. Mr. Swayne: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will make a statement about her responsibility with regard to presentation of Government policy on genetically modified organisms. [120444]

Marjorie Mowlam: My primary role has been the co-ordination of biotechnology policy across Government through the Ministerial group on Biotechnology Misc6.

In presenting policy on GMOs I have been articulating the Government's priority which is effective regulation for the protection of human health and the environment.

Government Services (Delivery)

11. Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what discussions she has had with her counterparts in other countries on improving the delivery of Government services. [120445]

Marjorie Mowlam: There is a lot of international interest in our programme to modernise government and improve public services; and I am always keen to benefit from what others have found works for them. I have had discussions with counterparts and officials in the following countries:

Argentina

Belgium

Brazil

Germany

New Zealand

Portugal

Sweden

USA.

Special Advisers

12. Mr. Paterson: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will make a statement on the number of special advisers employed by the Government. [120446]

Mr. Stringer: I refer the hon. Member to my answer of 15 December 1999, Official Report, column 227W. Since then, a further five Special Advisers have been appointed.

Manufacturing (Regulations)

13. Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will calculate how many regulations controlling the activities of manufacturing businesses have been passed since May 1997. [120447]

Mr. Stringer: This information is not kept in the form requested and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Since August 1998, every regulation likely to have a significant impact on businesses, charities or voluntary organisations has been subject to a thorough assessment procedure. These regulatory impact assessments are placed in the Libraries of the House. The particular business sectors upon which each regulation impacts are not recorded separately.

Government Services (Accessibility)

14. Ms Julie Morgan: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how she intends to make Government services more accessible and responsive to the people they serve. [120449]

Marjorie Mowlam: We have appointed consumer champions in all the key central Government services, to find out and meet their users' wishes. We have been working hard to ensure we consult the public better and more widely about policy and services.

We are working to provide extended opening hours in the services where there is greatest demand, and we will provide electronic access to all services by 2005.

Drug Prevention (Lancashire)

15. Mr. Borrow: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what plans she has to improve the long-term funding of drug prevention schemes in Lancashire. [120450]

Marjorie Mowlam: Local Drug Action Teams work in partnership with local agencies such as health and local authorities, police, probation and local education authorities to decide the financial priorities for drug prevention within their area according to local need. The Lancashire Drug Action Team receives a grant from the Home Office's Drug Prevention Advisory Service (DPAS) to fund its running costs. However, funding for their activities is channelled for the most part through local agencies. In addition, the Government's spending review is looking at ways to streamline funding and strengthen local delivery.

Parliamentary Questions

16. Helen Jackson: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what progress has been made in the speeding up of replies to parliamentary questions. [120451]

Marjorie Mowlam: I met the Speaker on 18 April to discuss performance in replying to Parliamentary Questions and correspondence from hon. Members. It was a constructive meeting. I set out the action that we had already taken over the last 12 months to improve performance: writing to Departments at Ministerial and Permanent Secretary level; workshops on the effective handling of correspondence; central seminars for staff involved in handling PQs. For the future, we also propose central training for staff in Parliamentary branches and elsewhere who have regular dealings with Parliament to ensure there is a good grasp of essentials. We will shortly be revising and reissuing central guidance to all Departments on the handling of correspondence.

Departmental Websites

17. Mr. Evans: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what guidance she gives Departments on the contents of departmental websites. [120454]

Mr. Ian McCartney: The Guidelines for Government Websites give detailed guidance on content. They are available on the Information Age Champions website at www.iagchampions.gov.uk and I have today arranged for a copy to be placed in the Libraries of the House.

Rural White Paper

18. Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what Government Department will be given responsibility for the integration of policy initiatives following the rural White Paper. [120455]

Marjorie Mowlam: Problems facing rural communities cannot be tackled in isolation by an individual Department—we will get the best results by central Government working in a joined-up way. Primary responsibility for rural policy lies with my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister while the Cabinet Committee on Rural Affairs, which I chair, will play an important co-ordination role.

Ombudsman Service

19. Mr. Caton: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will make a statement concerning the review of the Ombudsman service. [120456]

Mr. Stringer: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Morecambe and Lunesdale (Miss Smith) on 13 April 2000, Official Report, column 241W.

Public Bodies (Appointments)

20. Mr. Bill O'Brien: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what plans she has to change the system for making appointments to public bodies; and if she will make a statement. [120457]

Mr. Stringer: I have no such plans at present. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health is considering changes to the NHS appointments process, in the light of the recent report of the Commissioner for Public Appointments.

Drug Action Teams

22. Mr. Russell Brown: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what contribution is made by drug action teams to the delivery of the Government's drugs strategy. [120459]

Mr. Ian McCartney: Drug Action Teams (DATs) have a crucial role in the delivery of the National Drugs Strategy. They are the main mechanism for delivery on the ground, they work as a local partnership of the agencies involved in tackling drugs such as, Probation, Health, Education, Police Authorities and Local Authorities. DATs are required to plan and deliver an effective programme of activities for drugs which supports the National Strategy. DATs identify gaps in their provision and seek to address this. They assess what is being done in their area under each aim of the strategy, what is being spent and by whom and monitor the success of local initiatives.

Written Answers to Questions

PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Business Co-ordination Unit

Maria Eagle: To ask the President of the Council what plans she has to set up a unit to co-ordinate contacts between the business sector and Government Departments. [122225]

Mrs. Beckett: Following discussions with the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, I have set up a new Business Co-ordination unit within my Department. It will work with the DTI and Treasury to co-ordinate contacts across other Government Departments with the business community.

The Government have always been committed to maintaining good channels of communication between themselves and the business community, and this unit will make further contributions to that work.

I have been asked to take on this role by the Prime Minister because of my role as cross-Government spokesperson and my experience of leading initiatives which cut across the whole of Whitehall. I will be working closely with my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

CABINET OFFICE

Civil Service (Sickness Rates)

Barbara Follett: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what was the overall level of sickness absence in the Civil Service in 1998. [122148]

Marjorie Mowlam: The report 'Analysis of Sickness Absence in the Civil Service 1998' prepared for my Department by BMI Health Services Ltd. shows that when the same methodology as in previous years was applied the average level of sickness absence was 9.8 days per staff year. This compares with a figure of 10.1 days for 1997. Calculated on the basis of absence per person, the figure for the Civil Service was 8.4 days. The report contains a comprehensive analysis of the 1998 figures.

In tandem with the preparation of that report, Departments and agencies have separately been undertaking audits of their monitoring systems as recommended in the July 1998 report 'Managing Attendance in the Public Sector'. In some cases these audits have revealed an element of under recording. The BMI report also contains figures reworked to reflect the audit findings, and these show that the average figure for sickness absence in 1998 was 10.3 days per staff year. These revised figures came too late and in insufficient detail for them to be taken into account in the report's data analysis.

My Department is continuing to work with other Departments and agencies as they take forward their plans to reduce sickness absence. Overall the Civil Service has been targeted to reduce sickness absence by 20 per cent. for 2001 and 30 per cent. for 2003 against the 1998 baseline.

I have placed copies of the BMI report in the Libraries of the House.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has for additional capital expenditure in relation to the handling of asylum claimants in the vicinity of Gatwick Airport. [121509]

Mrs. Roche: The Immigration Service at Gatwick is at present looking at accommodation in the Horley/Crawley area in order to improve its capability in handling asylum and other casework. Dealing with asylum claims is one of the Immigration Service's top priorities. A central unit in the Gatwick area is being considered, but as yet no firm decisions have been made.

Animal Experiments

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of the (a) transgenic pigs and (b) monkeys killed in the last four years died at Huntingdon Life Sciences; and if he will make a statement. [121506]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Section 24 of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 prevents me from disclosing detailed information of this nature about an individual establishment licensed under the Act. We are examining Section 24 in the context of Freedom of Information changes.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many animals broken down by species were allowed into the United Kingdom for use in experiments for each year from 1990 to date; and if he will make a statement. [121507]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Home Office does not record centrally the number of animals used in scientific procedures broken down according to their source.

Since 1995, Table 2 of the Statistics of Scientific Procedures on Living Animals, published annually in separate volumes for Great Britain and Northern Ireland, has reported the number of scientific procedures carried out using species listed in Schedule 2 of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 analysed according to the source of the animals used. Similar statistics were not collected and published before 1995.

The numbers of scientific procedures carried out in Great Britain and Northern Ireland using Schedule 2 species acquired direct from sources outside the United Kingdom in each year from 1995 to 1998 were as follows.

Species of animal	1995	1996	1997	1998
Mouse	8,624	11,285	13,361	15,943
Rat	9,348	10,849	3,499	2,740
Guinea Pig	16	0	0	793
Hamster	1,744	141	218	1,596
Rabbit	4	42	0	30
Cat	0	0	0	0
Dog	941	977	100	80
Primate	1,156	741	361	395
Quail (Cotumix cotumix)	0	0	0	0
Total	21,833	24,035	17,539	21,577

Statistics for 1999 are currently being collected and are due to be published in July 2000.

Police and Fire Authority Pensions

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the impact of pension payments on police and fire authorities' budgets in each of the next three years; and if he will make a statement. [121479]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Under the Central Local Partnership, the Home Office has been working closely with representatives of fire and police authorities to assess resource demands for the next three years. Projections by the services concerned were made by the Local Government Association's Fire Service Expenditure Forecasting Group and the Association of Police Authorities/Association of Chief Police Officers in its report "Policing the Future - Report of the Police Service Expenditure Forecasting Group". Pensions pressures are being taken into account in consideration of Spending Review 2000.

Police Manpower

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of the police in post on an average day in 1999 were available for duty on that day. [121675]

Mr. Charles Clarke: This information is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Community Service Orders

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were given a community service orders in each of the last five years; how many of such orders were breached in each year; and how many people who breached those orders were benefit claimants. [121525]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Information for the years 1988 to 1998 on the number of persons given a community service order and the number who breach such orders is published in Table 7.26 of the command paper "Criminal statistics, England and Wales, 1998". A copy of this publication is available in the Library.

Data on the number of persons breaching an order who are benefit claimants are not collected centrally.

Criminal Justice (Mode of Trial) (No. 2) Bill

Sir Nicholas Lyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his oral statement of 7 March 2000, Official Report, column 886, on the Criminal Justice (Mode of Trial) (No. 2) Bill, on what basis he calculated that the removal of the right to elect trial by jury in either-way cases will produce savings of more than £120 million per year. [121294]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I refer the right hon. and learned Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary to the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe) on 2 March 2000, Official Report, column 377W.

Lowdham Grange Prison

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will publish the report of the Chief Inspector of Prisons following the inspection of HMP Lowdham Grange. [121489]

Mr. Boateng: The Chief Inspector published his report on 27 April.

Murder and Rape Trials

Sir Nicholas Lyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average waiting period in the last 12 months for which figures are available between charge and commencement of trial in cases of (a) murder and (b) rape; and what were the equivalent figures at 1 May (i) 1997, (ii) 1998 and (iii) 1999. [121290]

Jane Kennedy: I have been asked to reply.

Overall average waiting times from charge to start of trail for offences dealt with at the Crown Court are not available. Average waiting times are available separately for the period from charge to committal from magistrates courts, and for the period from committal to the Crown Court to start of trial. However the available data for both the magistrates courts and the Crown Court cannot identify murder and rape cases separately from broader offence groupings.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

GM Crop Trials

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if yield data will be published from the GM crop trials designed to monitor environmental impact. [120716]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 3 May 2000]: There are no plans to publish yield data as part of the farm scale evaluations of GM crops.

Freight

Mr. Dobbin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps his Department is taking to transfer freight from roads to rail. [120845]

Mr. Hill: Our policy is to help to establish an integrated, sustainable freight distribution system, both to support economic growth and to bring social and environmental benefits. The Strategic Rail Authority, already operating in shadow form, will have a duty to promote rail freight. In the three years beginning April 1997 we have provided £81 million in grants to move freight from road to rail or inland waterways. We have issued guidance to local authorities to facilitate more use of rail for freight, and our forthcoming 10 year Transport Plan will set out the Government's longer term strategy.

Royal Train

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 2 May 2000, Official Report, column 5W, how many journeys on the Royal Train have involved the use of the sleeping accommodation. [121269]

Mr. Hill: All the Royal Train journeys during the year ended 31 March 2000 involved the use of sleeping accommodation.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how much was paid to Wisconsin Central to service and operate the Royal Train in the last 12 months for which figures are available. [121257]

Mr. Hill: No money was paid to Wisconsin Central. However, as set out in the published Annual Report on the Grant-in-aid for Royal Travel by air and rail covering the financial year ended 31 March 1999, £779,000 was paid to English Welsh & Scottish Railway, which is the operator of the Royal Train and a UK subsidiary of Wisconsin Central.

Tees Barrage

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what payments have been (a) made and (b) agreed as part of a management licence to British Waterways for operating the Tees Barrage. [121480]

Ms Armstrong: Under the terms of a Management Agreement signed on 31 March 2000 between British Waterways and the Commission for the New Towns, BW assumed operational responsibility for managing the Tees Barrage, maintaining related facilities and the obligations attached thereto, as if it were the owner. An endowment of £17,696,616 was paid to BW. It is intended that the freehold of the property will be conveyed to BW shortly, together with a formal transfer of the powers and functions in the River Tees Barrage and Crossing Act 1990. It is not expected that any further endowment will be paid.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Minimum Wage

15. Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the effect of the national minimum wage. [120519]

Mr. Alan Johnson: We asked the Low Pay Commission to monitor the introduction of the national minimum wage and to report on their findings. We published their report on 15 February along with our response to it.

19. Mr. McCabe: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to ensure that all those entitled to the national minimum wage receive it. [120523]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The Inland Revenue is responsible for enforcing the national minimum wage. If any worker believes they are not being paid what they are entitled to under the law they simply have to phone the minimum wage helpline on 0845 6000 678 to make a complaint about underpayment. All complaints, including third party tip-offs, are followed up.

The Government recognise that it is vital for workers to be aware of their entitlements under the law. Around £5 million was spent on advertising the minimum wage at the time of its introduction last year. A smaller campaign in the autumn targeted certain ethnic groups where awareness was still relatively low. There will be further paid publicity spanning the periods when the youth rate and main rate are increased on 1 June and 1 October respectively.

The Government are working with relevant worker and employer organisations to help improve awareness of the minimum wage. As recommended by the Low Pay Commission, we will update our general guidance and provide specific information for certain groups. The Government are asking the Commission to continue to monitor the national minimum wage and to produce a further report on its introduction by July 2001.

Gas-fired Power Stations

16. Mr. Bradshaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the impact on energy prices in the South-West of his decision to lift the moratorium on new gas-fired power stations. [120520]

Mrs. Liddell: I have made no assessment specifically on the South-West, but Government energy policy should lead to a continuing downward pressure in energy prices.

Post Office

18. Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the future of rural and suburban sub-post offices. [120522]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The Government are contributing £480 million toward the cost of equipping the whole national network of post offices with an automated on-line IT platform. This investment in the automation project is substantial and is a clear indication of the Government's commitment to the future of the Post Office network. Nearly 40,000 counter positions in over 18,000 offices will be equipped with the modern computer system. Automation will attract new customers and services to the Post Office, replacing traditional business progressively eroded by changing customer demands and habits, which, in turn, will contribute to strengthening the long-term viability of the network.

In addition, the Performance and Innovation Unit is examining the longer term future of the network and is working across Government Departments to establish how best the Post Office network can be used and promoted.

20. Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the Performance and Innovation Unit report into the Post Office network. [120524]

Mr. Alan Johnson: I understand that the Performance and Innovation Unit will report the results of its study of the Post Office counters network to the Prime Minister shortly.

23. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate he has made of the levels of subsidy that will be required to safeguard the future of post offices in small towns and villages and in rural areas. [120528]

Mr. Alan Johnson: It is too early to assume that subsidy would be the right way forward. The Government's key target is a viable commercial future for the Post Office network. The Government are using the opportunity of the Post Office Bill to propose taking the necessary powers to keep open the option of financial assistance.

32. Mr. David Heath: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent discussions he has had with the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the scale and timing of the proposed subsidy to sub-post offices threatened with closure. [120537]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The Government have no plans at present to subsidise the network of post offices, but are using the opportunity of the Post Office Bill to propose taking the necessary powers to provide financial assistance towards ensuring provision of postal and other services at post offices, should that prove necessary at some future stage.

Personal Service Companies

21. Mr. Brooke: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry by what means he monitors whether the UK's international competitiveness is adversely affected by the working of IR35. [120525]

Ms Hewitt: We are committed to ensuring a fair tax system. It is clearly unfair that someone using a personal service company and carrying out the job of an employee has been able to enjoy a big tax and NICs advantage over other employees. Avoidance through service companies placed a burden on other tax and NIC payers and damaged the UK's competitiveness.

The IR35 proposals enable the use of personal service companies to continue but without the previous unfair scope for avoiding payment of Tax and NICs.

Manufacturing

22. Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to assist manufacturing industry. [120526]

Mr. Alan Johnson: We are assisting manufacturing industry to be competitive by creating the right economic climate and by pursuing policies that help firms to innovate and grow.

34. Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the impact on manufacturing industry of the strength of the pound. [120539]

Mr. Alan Johnson: This Government understand the difficulties many manufacturers, particularly those trading with Europe, are facing because of the value of the pound in relation to the euro. However we are determined to take a long-term view—attempts at short-term fixes would ultimately do more harm than good.

The latest average of independent forecasts for the UK economy points to manufacturing output rising by 2.2 per cent. this year, in line with the top end of the Treasury's Budget forecast.

36. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the effect of the current value of the pound on the competitiveness of UK manufacturing industry. [120541]

Mr. Alan Johnson: This Government understand the difficulties which many manufacturers, particularly those trading with Europe, face as a result of the weakness of the euro, but competitiveness depends on a wide range of factors.

The platform for economic stability created by this Government, together with the structural measures to promote competition, to encourage enterprise and innovation, and to raise the skills base and investment, provides the best economic environment for improving industrial competitiveness in the UK.

Shipbuilding

24. Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on his Department's strategy to assist the British shipbuilding industry. [120529]

Mr. Alan Johnson: My Department's strategy is to support and promote the UK shipbuilding industry, and in particular, to assist the industry to improve its competitiveness. In July 1998 my Department established the Shipbuilding Forum whose membership comprises representatives of the shipbuilding and ship repair industry, trade unions, equipment suppliers and customers, both private and public sector. Also involved are the National Training Organisation for the marine sector and relevant Government Departments. The Forum's terms of reference are to consider the current situation of the shipbuilding and ship repair industry and how to improve its competitiveness so as to increase its share of the European market, leading to increased output, profitability and employment.

35. Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the future of the shipbuilding industry. [120540]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The Government's policies are to establish the macroeconomic conditions within which the management of individual industries and companies can maximise their output, growth and employment prospects. The Government do not make forecasts for individual industries in the private sector.

North Sea Oil

25. Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent discussions he has had with oil and gas companies regarding future investment in field development in the North Sea. [120530]

Mrs. Liddell: Ministerial colleagues and I regularly meet oil and gas companies. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Energy and Competitiveness in Europe chairs the industry/Government forum PILOT which is actively considering ways of encouraging investment in North Sea oil and gas development. In addition, in February, my Department announced an initiative to target areas where there has been no exploration or development for some time.

Rover

26. Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the future of the Longbridge plant. [120531]

Mr. Alan Johnson: Alchemy's cessation of negotiations with BMW provides a new opportunity for proposals to come forward which offer a viable future for Longbridge and which may provide more jobs than under the Alchemy proposals.

This Government's efforts over the next few weeks will be directed towards achieving a successful outcome which will serve the interests of the workers at Longbridge and the wider community in the West Midlands.

28. Mrs. Heal: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on progress made by the Rover Task Force. [120533]

Mr. Alan Johnson: When I announced the creation of the Rover Task Force on the day following BMW's decision to break up the Rover Group, I asked it to look into the effect that would have on the Longbridge area of Birmingham and on the supplier chain and to make recommendations about what should be done to lessen the impact.

The Task Force has 21 members drawn from and representing a wide range of organisations in the West Midlands and produced an interim report published on 26 April. I have asked it to produce a final report at the end of June 2000.

In its interim report, the Task Force drew on over 1,000 questionnaires completed and returned to it by supplier chain companies and from the work done by its five sub-groups which have been created to assess the impact both on individuals and businesses. The Task Force has already provided telephone helplines for individuals and suppliers and a website. The report makes a number of additional recommendations about short and medium term actions that should be taken to regenerate the region and action is already being taken to support identified needs.

At the outset of the Task Force's work I committed £129 million to assist the people, communities and businesses of the West Midlands affected by BMW's decision. I have already given approval for £12 million worth of support for the West Midlands supplier chain companies from the £129 million. This will help them to draw up fresh Business Plans, find fresh markets, obtain export advice and receive support for retooling and retraining. An additional commitment of £15.5 million, over and above the £129 million, has been made to support individuals. This money is providing help through a Rapid Response Unit at Longbridge offering fast-track access to benefits and training and is tackling re-skilling and re-training for workers from Rover and its supplier chain who will be made redundant or whose jobs will be affected.

The Task Force has also been working with regional partners on:

Bank support for business—ensuring a consistent and supportive approach to suppliers dependent on Rover; and help for businesses to deal with this serious shock to the market.

Tracking of each individual who is made redundant so that progress can be monitored and additional support given if needed. The aim is to maximise the successful redeployment of people and skills.

Creating a Task Force People's Guide on available help for those facing redundancy. This 60-page booklet has been printed and will be sent out shortly.

Support for apprentices/graduate trainees to complete their training and to maximise the retention of skills in the region and in the UK.

A study into development of the region for high-tech manufacture in the West Midlands, including A38 Corridor and Longbridge.

West Midlands Regional Supply Office activities to enable it to find alternative local customers for some present suppliers to Rover across the manufacturing sector.

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will estimate the numbers of jobs which would be lost in (a) Shrewsbury and (b) Shropshire if Rover were to close; and if he will make a statement. [121762]

Mr. Alan Johnson: It is good news that BMW have come to an arrangement with the Phoenix Consortium to purchase Rover–Longbridge. Until more details are available it is too early to comment on the impact on jobs in the Shrewsbury and Shropshire areas.

Export Credit Guarantees

27. Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress he has made in his review of the export credit guarantee scheme. [120532]

Mr. Caborn: The Review of ECGD's Mission and Status, which I announced last July, is proceeding satisfactorily. The public consultation exercise and a number of independent studies into certain aspects of ECGD's operations have provided valuable evidence. These inputs will enable Ministers to determine the right way forward for ECGD, and I expect to announce the outcome of the Mission Review to the House in the next month or so. I expect the Status element of the Review to be completed later in the year.

Business Regulation

29. Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent representations he has received about the cost to business of regulations controlling business activity since 1997. [120534]

Ms Hewitt: Regulation is one of many issues I discuss as part of my regular contacts with business.

Aerospace Industry

31. Mr. Borrow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent discussions he has had with Ministers in the EU and USA concerning the restructuring of the aerospace industry; and if he will make a statement. [120536]

Mr. Alan Johnson: My officials and I maintain regular contact with EU and American Governments involved in the restructuring of the aerospace industry. I attended a meeting of industry ministers from six European countries in Rome last October to discuss the prospects for continued progress on aerospace restructuring.

It was a useful opportunity for me to meet colleagues from key European aerospace nations and to have the opportunity for direct dialogue with senior industrialists. Our discussions covered a wide range of issues relevant to the future success of the industry. My objective is that the UK should continue to play a leading role in international restructuring and maintain the global competitiveness of its aerospace sector.

Equal Opportunities (Small Businesses)

33. Miss Begg: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps his Department is taking to ensure small businesses understand the regulations relating to equal opportunities. [120538]

Ms Hewitt: The Small Business Service provides a wealth of information intended to ensure that small businesses understand the regulations relating to equal opportunities.

The DTI is also working with DfEE, the three statutory equality commissions, and ACAS on the development of a pilot information and advice service for business to be launched in the Autumn, called Equality Direct, based on business needs. The service will provide authoritative, confidential and coherent information and advice on all aspects of equal opportunities.

Council for Science and Technology

37. Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the role of the Council for Science and Technology. [120542]

Ms Hewitt: The Council for Science and Technology is the Prime Minister's top level advisory body on strategic issues concerning the Government's policies and framework for ensuring that science and technology meet the needs of the United Kingdom. The Council's terms of reference, along with information about its work and advisory reports are available on its website at www.cst.gov.uk.

Renewable Energy

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on his Department's support for renewable energy technologies. [120518]

Mrs. Liddell: The Government announced in February their target for PES of 10 per cent. electricity from renewables. This is to stimulate the development of renewable energy so that it can provide a continuously growing contribution in the competitive market, as part of our climate change programme.

We have a target of achieving 5 per cent. of UK electricity from renewables by 2003 and 10 per cent. by 2010. The cost of course must be acceptable to consumers.

Coal Miners (Compensation)

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 12 April 2000, Official Report, column 153W, on coal miners' compensation, if he will name hospitals that have not been prepared to release miners' medical records. [120352]

Mrs. Liddell: Following the issuing of guidance by the NHS Executive and the BMA to Hospital Trusts and GPs respectively, I am advised by Healthcall, the company contracted to obtain the medical records, that there are no hospitals that are not prepared to release medical records. However I am aware that it may take time for hospitals to retrieve records, which in some cases date back many years. My Department is monitoring the position very closely and I will have no hesitation in informing Members of any hospitals in their constituencies where we experience difficulties in the future.

Electricity Generation

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the membership of the working group composed of representatives from the Government, Ofgem and the industry that is examining the issues that surround embedded generation; what is the work programme of the group and its timescale; if he will publish minutes of the group's meetings to date; and if he will make a statement. [120843]

Mrs. Liddell: The working group on Embedded Generation Network Issues was set up following the issue of the Department's consultation document 'Electricity Network Management Issues' (URN 99/1237). It is chaired by Dr. Brian Wharmby, technical director of Ofgem and comprises representatives of network operators, generators, suppliers and consumers, the Energy Savings Trust, DETR, DTI and Ofgem. It held its first meeting in March and proposes to complete its work by the end of the year 2000. The group has agreed that its membership, terms of reference and agreed meeting minutes should be published on the DTI website. The pages are available at www.dti.gov.uk/energy/egwg/index.htm

Industrial Grant Aid

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the (a) grants and (b) grant aid he has promised (i) the car industry and (ii) the coal industry since May 1997; from which budgets they will be drawn; what they are for; and for which he has EU approval. [120856]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 5 May 2000]: The information is as follows:

(i) details of projects are published in the Labour Market Trends.

(ii) details were contained in my statement to the House on 17 April.

Chief Scientific Adviser

Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the procedure for recruiting the Government Chief Scientific Adviser following the retirement of Sir Robert May. [120431]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 10 May 2000]: The post of Government Chief Scientific Adviser was advertised in the national press in March 2000. The competition for the post is being conducted according to the rules laid down by the Civil Service Commissioners.

E-commerce

Mr. Flight: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps his Department is taking to promote e-commerce; and if he will make a statement. [120507]

Ms Hewitt: The Government have put e-commerce at the heart of their vision for building a competitive, modern, knowledge-driven economy, and the DTI plays a leading role in realising this.

In September 1999, the Prime Minister launched the report 'E-commerce@its.best.uk' which set out the Government's strategy to make the UK the best place in the world to trade electronically. This strategy is based on:

Ensuring that we have the right regulatory environment and market framework to allow e-commerce to flourish in the UK.

Preventing a digital divide by ensuring that we have the level of skills and access to enable businesses and individuals to make full use of the new technologies.

Ensuring that Government act as an exemplar by getting their own services online.

Specific actions taken by DTI as part of the strategy to promote e-commerce include:

The 'Information Society Initiative', aimed at increasing the usage of e-commerce by small businesses.

Measures to promote consumer confidence when trading online.

The Electronic Communications Bill, which gives legal recognition to electronic signatures and encourages an industry-led system of self-regulation.

Helping all communities get access to the new technologies through the 'IT For All' programme.

Motor Industry

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many (a) Rover franchised dealers and (b) BMW franchised dealers there are in the United Kingdom; and how many people are employed in each. [121592]

Mr. Byers: I refer the hon. Member to the answers given to the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) on 29 March 2000, Official Report, column 196.

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussion his Department has held with the retail motor industry representatives since the publication of the Competition Commission report into the sale of new cars. [121593]

Mr. Byers: Since the publication of the Competition Commission report on the supply of new cars, my Department has had discussions with representatives of a number of industry bodies, including the Retail Motor Industry Federation and the Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders, and with representatives of a number of individual companies.

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what powers he has to (a) amend and (b) withdraw the Block Exemption Regulations relating to the sale of new cars before September 2002. [121594]

Mr. Byers: The current Block Exemption for motor vehicle distribution and servicing agreements is a European Commission regulation. Member states have no power to amend it. Withdrawal of the benefit of the Block Exemption is one of several possible courses of action which the Competition Commission recommended for consideration. My Department is exploring the complex legal questions associated with these options, and is in close discussions with the European Commission.

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many people are employed in the retail, after sales and repair of motor vehicles in the United Kingdom. [121589]

Mr. Byers: According to the Office for National Statistics (ONS), at December 1999, 329,913 people were employed in the retail, after sales and repairs of motor vehicles in the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many businesses provide services and components to vehicle manufacturers in the United Kingdom; and how many people are employed in these businesses. [121591]

Mr. Byers: The information is not available in the form requested.

Community Hospitals Group

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will refer the BUPA takeover of Community Hospitals Group to the Competition Commission in respect of the implications of vertical integration in the supply of private medical services. [121598]

Dr. Howells: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry will decide whether or not to refer this case to the Competition Commission in the light of the independent advice of the Director General of Fair Trading. Each case is considered on its individual merits.

Inward Investment

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to encourage future inward investment into the UK; and if he will make a statement. [120504]

Mr. Caborn: The Department's Invest in Britain Bureau will continue to promote the attractions of the UK for mobile international investment. The UK is the No. 1 location in Europe for inward investment and the Government are determined to ensure that this is maintained in the face of increasing competition from our European partners. We will continue to pursue economic policies which enhance the UK's attractions including developing our skills base, providing flexible labour markets and a stable economy.

Competition Act 1998

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the implementation of the Competition Act 1998 in respect of local authorities. [121478]

Dr. Howells: The new systems which prohibit anti-competitive agreements undertakings, and abuse by an undertaking of a dominant position, came into force on 1 March 2000. The prohibitions apply to a local authority if it is acting as an undertaking, that is to say if it is acting in a commercial or economic capacity.

DEFENCE

Decommissioned Nuclear Submarines

Ms Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made on the study into options for the storage of decommissioned nuclear submarines; and if he will make a statement. [122119]

Dr. Moonie: My predecessor announced in March 1998 that we would undertake a study into options for the storage of decommissioned nuclear-powered submarines. The initial phase of our study has been completed. We have concluded that while afloat storage would remain a safe option, if suitable alternative venues could be identified, land storage offers the best overall solution in the long term. Further work will now be undertaken to determine which land storage option should be adopted. I expect this further work to take up to three years to complete.

The purpose of the next phase will be to determine which land storage solution should be adopted. This work will be taken forward in conjunction with industry, who will be invited to submit their proposals, with a view to entering into a Public/Private arrangement. As part of the process, we will further develop one land storage option, the removal and storage of the intact reactor compartment and the recycling of the remainder of the submarine, as a basis for comparison with industry proposals. We have not identified specific land store sites, but would expect these to emerge from the proposals we receive from industry. No decision will be taken on the most suitable storage option, or on a site, until we have completed the next phase of the study, which will include full and open consultation. As part of this process, environmental impact assessments will be undertaken for each storage option taken forward.

We are providing oral briefings to interested parties and the media, and material is also available on the MOD website. In addition, we are inviting written comments as a means of shaping and informing our further work and plan to consult widely during the next phase of the study.

Separately, and in parallel, we have received an unsolicited commercial proposal from Babcock Rosyth Defence Limited, the owners of Rosyth Royal Dockyard, to dismantle the reactor compartment of one decommissioned nuclear submarine, HMS Renown, and store the components. This would be an alternative to the traditional nuclear decommissioning work planned to start at Rosyth later this year and would not lead to any overall increase in the radioactive waste already held there. The intermediate level waste from Renown would be held initially in the purpose built facility at Rosyth, but BRDL have been asked to make proposals for its eventual removal.

The Babcock proposals will be taken forward in two stages and I have agreed that the first, which will involve feasibility and planning work only, may proceed. There will be no question of moving to the second, implementation, stage of the proposal until and unless we and the relevant regulatory authorities are entirely satisfied. In these circumstances I will make a further announcement.

During this second stage, we will work with Babcock to produce an environmental impact assessment, which will involve public consultation. In addition, the company will have to satisfy the nuclear safety and environmental requirements of the independent regulators, including the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate and the Scottish Environment Protection Agency before the dismantling work can begin. The company will be briefing local interest groups and the media tomorrow.

In all of the above, safety remains of paramount importance and we will work to the same standards that apply to civil nuclear industry.

Defence Diversification Agency

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will extend the remit of the technology transfer managers established by the Defence Diversification Agency to cover large firms. [120643]

Dr. Moonie: The White Paper, "Defence Diversification: Getting the most out of defence technology", does not restrict the remit of the DDA technology diversification managers to supporting only small and medium enterprises (SMEs). In its first year of operation the DDA has successfully assisted companies of all sizes. However, from an operational perspective the agency has to prioritise allocation of its resources and has tended to concentrate effort on SMEs. These companies, while contributing to UK's wealth and creating jobs, have less resources of their own than larger companies to access and thus benefit from DERA's technology.

Nuclear Test Veterans

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many claims for compensation for damage to health by British nuclear test veterans have been made; and how many have been settled. [121613]

Dr. Moonie: My Department has recorded 144 claims for compensation from British Nuclear Test veterans. As there is no evidence of excess illness or mortality among British Nuclear Test veterans as a group which could be linked to their participation in the nuclear tests, no compensation claims from them have been settled. In any event, prior to May 1987, Service personnel were prevented from pursuing claims for compensation from the Ministry of Defence by section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act 1947. The repeal of section 10 by the Crown Proceedings (Armed Forces) Act 1987 was not made retrospective and claims arising from injury or illness caused before the repeal are barred by law.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he last met ex-British service personnel nuclear test victims to discuss compensation for damage to health; and if he will make a statement. [121614]

Dr. Moonie: There have been no meetings between my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence and British nuclear test veterans to discuss compensation. There have, however, been extensive exchanges of correspondence relating to compensation between Defence Ministers and the British Nuclear Tests Veterans Association, as well as with Members of Parliament.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what reports he has received about compensation paid by the New Zealand Government for damage to health of servicemen as a result of nuclear tests. [121616]

Dr. Moonie: The New Zealand Government have not, to our knowledge, paid compensation to servicemen who participated in nuclear test programmes. However, we are aware that as a result of a New Zealand Inquiry into the health status of veterans' children, published last year, a programme of assistance to test veterans and their families, funded by their Government, was recommended. Such assistance was to take the form of case management, family counselling and genetic counselling where appropriate.

In addition, the New Zealand Government announced on 29 April 2000 the grants of NZ$200,000 (about £60,000) to the New Zealand Nuclear Test Veterans Association, a one-time payment to assist the purposes of the Association, including further research and initiatives which provide support to the veterans and their families.

UK Service Personnel (United Nations)

Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if UK servicemen serving under UN auspices are given UN pay. [121082]

Mr. Spellar: No. UK Service personnel deployed on UN operations continue to receive UK pay. However, UK Service personnel serving under UN auspices are entitled to UN personal allowances. Personnel serving in formed units received the UN Daily Allowance of $1.26 per day and a Rest and Recreation Allowance of $10.50 per day, for up to seven days leave. Troops serving as UN monitors receive a separate UN allowance of about $120.00 per day for the first 30 days of duty and about $90.00 per day thereafter, because they are responsible for finding their own food and accommodation. These rates are set in US dollars and are paid to UK personnel either in US dollars, pounds sterling or local currency depending on circumstances.

MOD Accommodation

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many empty Ministry of Defence houses in the United Kingdom are earmarked for (a) officers and (b) other ranks broken down by individual service; and if he will make a statement. [118651]

Dr. Moonie: Service Families Accommodation(SFA) is managed on a tri-Service basis and is provided according to entitlement i.e. rank and family size. A breakdown by individual Service is not therefore available. The figures given are for SFA on mainland UK. As at 5 May 2000, there are 2,092 unoccupied officers' properties, of which 752 are allocated and 216 are undergoing refurbishment. There are also 12,437 unoccupied other ranks' properties, of which 4,007 are allocated and 1,359 are undergoing refurbishment.

The majority of empty Service quarters are only temporarily so. There are over 22,000 Service family moves a year and this requires a management margin of empty stock ready for incoming occupants. An on-going modernisation programme and Defence reorganisations also demand that a considerable number of properties are empty while work is completed and further plans are clarified. Come 6,500 surplus properties are planned for disposal during the next two years.

As at 2 May 2000, in Northern Ireland, there are 50 unoccupied officers' quarters of which 17 are allocated and three are undergoing refurbishment. There are also 423 other ranks' quarters of which 118 are allocated and 11 are undergoing refurbishment.

Western European Union

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps have been taken by the Ministerial Council of the Western European Union to fill the post of Secretary General of the Western European Union. [120739]

Mr. Vaz: I have been asked to reply.

Javier Solana was appointed as Secretary General by the Council of the Western European Union on 25 November 1999. He is also the EU High Representative for Common Foreign and Security Policy and Secretary General of the Council.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Museums and Galleries (Entry Charges)

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what assessment he has made of the number of establishments that will benefit from the £1 single entry charge for museums and galleries. [120613]

Mr. Alan Howarth: Funds have been set aside and will be made available to enable the following currently charging national museums and galleries funded by my Department to introduce an admission charge of £1 from September 2001:

National Museum of Science and Industry
Natural History Museum
Victoria and Albert Museum
Imperial War Museum (Lambeth Road)
National Maritime Museum
Royal Armouries—Museum of Artillery, Fort Nelson.

Final decisions on the introduction of the £1 charge rest with the Trustees of these institutions.

I am also considering the extension of these arrangements to the Royal Armouries Museum in Leeds; the Museum of Science and Industry in Manchester; the Museum of London; the National Museums and Galleries on Merseyside; and Tate St. Ives.

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what assessment he has made of the application of the £1 single entry charge to institutions which offer composite ticketing arrangements which allow entry to more than one institution on the same ticket. [121368]

Mr. Alan Howarth: Calculations of compensation for the introduction of the £1 single entry charge are based on estimates of the total visitor income for the individual institutions concerned, including the estimated proceeds from composite tickets. If trustees of institutions wish to introduce joint ticketing arrangements, that is a matter for their discretion.

Badminton Association

Mr. White: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what (a) public and (b) Lottery funds have been given to the Badminton Association of England in each of the last 10 years. [121103]

Kate Hoey: Details of Exchequer funding by Sport England to the Badminton Association of England is readily available only for years since 1994–95. These are:

Year	Amount
1994–95	240,000
1995–96	240,000
1996–97	247,000
1997–98	286,000
1998–99	268,000
1999–2000	280,000

Lottery funding for the Badminton Association of England's World Class Programme is as follows:

Period	Amount
1 September 1997 to 31 August 1998	1,327,155
1 September 1998 to 31 August 1999	1,735,909
1 September 1999 to 31 August 2000	1,955,441

The Badminton Association of England has also received a Lottery award of £3,653,847 for a National Badminton Centre.

Funding (Audits)

Mr. White: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what (a) financial and (b) other audits his Department carries out on bodies funded through the Sports Council or by Lottery grants. [121102]

Kate Hoey: Sport England carries out, on its own and on UK Sport's behalf (until October this year), a rolling programme of management audits of bodies in receipt of Exchequer funding which ensures that such bodies are reviewed at least once every three years. Audits cover corporate governance, accounting and financial management, asset management, financial stability, contracting and procurement, personal issues, grant conditions and current issues.

Sport England also undertakes financial and award compliance checks on all schemes in receipt of lottery funding. These ensure adherence to award conditions and the avoidance of fraudulent claims. All lottery projects are also subject to post-completion monitoring which includes the operation and management of the facility.

Athletics Facilities

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what representations he has received from the Wenlock Olympian Society concerning funding for improvements for facilities for athletics; and when he will respond to them. [121356]

Kate Hoey: I received a letter from the Wenlock Olympian Society on 1 May. I will respond to the letter shortly.

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what representations he has received from the Midland Counties Athletic Association concerning the provision of athletics facilities at Much Wenlock. [121354]

Kate Hoey: My Department has not received any representations from the Midland Counties Athletic Association.

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if it is the policy of the Sports Lottery Council not to grant-aid athletics tracks of less than 400m in length; and if he will make a statement. [121357]

Kate Hoey: The Council of Sport England's policy in considering applications for lottery funding for athletics tracks is to follow the recommendations of UK Athletics as set out in the "National Athletics Facilities Strategy". The normal requirement is for a 400m track. However, the strategy allows some flexibility and states that where the criteria for the provision of such tracks are not met > every encouragement will be given to lower key training facilities designed to meet local needs for certain disciplines, such as a sprint straights with a bend, pole vault run ups, high jump beds etc.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Friends of Europe

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list those (a) civil servants, (b) ministers, (c) special advisers and (d) FCO Think Tank members who have addressed the Friends of Europe since its inception; in what capacity they spoke; at what cost; and if he will deposit the text of the speeches in the Library. [119814]

Mr. Vaz: At the request of the Centre for European Reform, Sir John Kerr, PUS, addressed a Friends of Europe/Centre for European Reform seminar in his official capacity on 14 April at the Belgian Ambassador's Residence in London. The title of the session was 'How much treaty reform does the EU need?' It was at no additional cost. He did not speak from a written text.

Mr. Roger Liddle, in his capacity as a special adviser in the Prime Minister's Policy Unit, addressed an audience in Brussels on 24 January. The event was co-hosted by the Friends of Europe and the British Embassy in Belgium. The title of his talk was 'Economic Reform and Social Justice in a modern Europe'. The cost to the British Embassy of the event, including a reception afterwards was £1,690.03. Mr. Liddle did not speak from a written text.

NATO Parliamentary Assembly

Mr. Russell Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what changes have been made in the composition of the NATO Parliamentary Assembly. [122291]

Mr. Vaz: My noble Friend Lord Sewel has replaced my noble Friend Lord Kennet as a member of the delegation.

Indonesia

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assistance his Department provides to the Indonesian Government on security sector reform. [121588]

Mr. Battle: We want to help the new reforming administration in Indonesia strengthen democratic control of the security forces. The attachment of a senior British police officer to our Embassy in Jakarta starting on 1 June, is a first step in our efforts to help bring this about. We are consulting others about appropriate international support for security sector reform in Indonesia.

Sudan

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has received concerning military attacks on the Nuba population of Sudan. [121582]

Mr. Hain: I am aware of a number of reports of military action in the Nuba Mountains and have received a number of representations about the bombing of a school in Kaouda in February of this year.

We have raised the specific case of the school, and the general issue of aerial bombing, with the Government of Sudan, and an EU Declaration was published on the subject on 5 May.

On 18 April, President Bashir announced that he had ordered the cessation of aerial bombings of targets in the South except where there was active fighting under way. We welcome this announcement and look to the Government of Sudan to honour it.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Milk Prices

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on his discussions with the major supermarket chains on the prices paid for the milk they purchase. [119586]

Ms Quin: While pricing decisions are a matter for retailers, we know from our contact with them that the supermarkets are aware of the concerns of producers over the low prices they are receiving for their milk.

At the 30 March summit we also removed dairy hygiene charges for farmers in England; announced that we are approaching the European Commission to remove the weight limit on the OTMS Scheme; and agreed to pay £22 million agrimonetary compensation to farmers. We have also encouraged the different parts of the food chain to come together and develop a code of practice so that farmers feel their concerns are being given greater weight.

Online Services

Mr. Robert Jackson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the services which (a) his Department and (b) the executive agencies responsible to his Department (i) provide online and (ii) expect to be deliverable online by 2002. [119433]

Mr. Morley: So that the Cabinet Office can publish the spring 2000 report monitoring progress towards delivery of all Government services electronically by 2005, we are currently collecting data which will include our progress on delivering 25 per cent. of Government services electronically by 2002.

I do not want to pre-empt that report, but I can say that we currently provide a range of services electronically that includes:

Application for cattle passports and notification of subsequent movements to the British Cattle Movement Service

Applications for Cattle Eartag numbers from farmers via approved eartag manufacturers

Date Based Export Scheme eligibility checks from approved abattoirs

Submission of milk test details for the national dairy herd from contracted laboratories

The CEFAS Agency is developing an interactive database to share data on live fish movements

An extensive website that provides a wide range of information services to the public and to business, including the ability to download a selection of MAFF forms

An electronic portal will soon be launched for farmers providing access from a single source to a wealth of information and advice available to them over the internet from Government, the NFU and business.

Further, an electronic service delivery strategy covering all our transactions is being developed in line with Government targets, and by 2002 we expect to make available electronically the following:

Submission of Farm Survey forms

Submission of the majority of subsidy claims for MAFF and IBEA payments

Downloading of all MAFF forms

Interactive capabilities on the portal to inspire Internet trade and enhance business skills in the farming community.

Millennium Dome

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has visited the Millennium Dome at Greenwich in an official capacity; and what plans he has to do so. [120585]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 3 May 2000]: I have not visited the Millennium Dome in a ministerial capacity.

Departmental Contracts

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list for the financial year 1998–99 (a) the number and (b) the total value of contracts let by his Department with external consultants and advisers that (i) were put out to competitive tender, (ii) were not put to competitive tender and (iii) were let on a non-commercial basis, stating in each case the names of the individuals or organisations that have carried out the work. NORTHERN IRELAND

Prison Service

Shona McIsaac: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress has been made with the Quinquennial Review of the Northern Ireland Prison Service. [122224]

Mr. Ingram: I have recently received the Review Team's report on the first stage of the Quinquennial Review. The report, which follows extensive internal and external consultation, analyses the performance of the Northern Ireland Prison Service since it became an Agency in April 1995, including how it is perceived by the various bodies and interests affected by the services that it provides—including its own staff. It also considers the services likely to be needed in future and the organisational options for delivering them.

It is clear from the report (a copy of which I am placing in the Library of each House) that the Prison Service has made considerable progress, in uniquely difficult circumstances, over the past five years. The report recommends unequivocally that Agency status should be retained as the most appropriate way of delivering custodial services in Northern Ireland.

I have accepted that recommendation and have asked the Review Team to embark on the second stage of the review, examining how the effectiveness and efficiency with which the Prison Service delivers its services and functions can be further improved in the future. The culmination of this final stage of the review will be the publication in the Summer of a new Framework Document for the Northern Ireland Prison Service.

Parades Commission

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are the outside remunerated interests of the Chairman of the Parades Commission, Mr. Anthony Holland. [120501]

Mr. Ingram: Up to 30 April 2000 Mr. Holland was the Principal Ombudsman at the Personal Investment Authority Ombudsman Bureau.

As from 1 May 2000 he became a part time Ombudsman at the Personal Investment Authority Ombudsman Bureau.

Northern Ireland Forum

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the total cost of producing the bound volumes of the reports of the Northern Ireland Forum; how many copies were produced; and to whom they were provided free of charge. [121255]

Mr. Mandelson: 150 bound volume sets of the reports of the Northern Ireland Forum were produced at a total cost of £49,000 with copies being sent, free of charge, to each member of the Forum. Copies will also be provided free of charge to libraries and other locations where they will be available for public reference.

HEALTH

Prostate Cancer

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to introduce PSA testing to screen for prostate cancer. [119730]

Yvette Cooper: In 1997, the United Kingdom National Screening Committee recommended against introducing population screening for prostate cancer using the prostate-specific antigen test. In the context of a national screening programme, the NSC concluded that the limited accuracy of the test could have led to a positive result for those without the disease. Follow-up procedures could have caused considerable unnecessary harm to healthy individuals.

The UK National Screening Committee is now reviewing the evidence in the light of technological improvements. I expect to receive further advice on prostrate cancer screening on the basis of this research from the UK National Screening Committee later this year.

Dental Services (Northamptonshire)

Mr. Tony Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many more dentists Northamptonshire Health Authority needs to overcome its shortage of NHS dentists; [120725]

(2) how many people telephoned Northamptonshire Health Authority from June to August 1999 about access to NHS dentistry; [120726]

(3) what action the Government are taking to ensure that all children in Northamptonshire are registered with a dentist. [120728]

Mr. Hutton: Registrations per head of population in Northamptonshire show that 54 per cent. are registered with General Dental Service dentists. This is 6 per cent. higher than the national average. Since December 1998 the number of dentists in the area has increased by six and there are now nearly 171 dentists in the area.

Of the 1,130 people who called Northamptonshire Health Authority seeking information on the availability of National Health Service dentists from June to August 1999, none called back unable to get placed with a National Health Service dentist.

We recognise that in some parts of the country it remains difficult to access National Health Service dental care. Positive steps have already been taken to address this problem. NHS dentists in the Northamptonshire Health Authority have received £45,000 in Investing in Dentistry grants. This has gone towards establishing brand new practices that have already begun to register additional patients.

Northamptonshire also has a second wave Personal Dental Services (PDS) pilot which is specifically targeted at increasing child registration. This is a co-operative approach between community dental service and three practices. It identifies children in need of care through school screening and offers follow up appointments.

Discussions will continue with the profession at a local level to improve and modernise the service.

NHS Administration Staff

Mr. Lilley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what has been the net reduction in the number of administrative jobs as a result of replacing the NHS internal market; [120333]

(2) how many administrative staff have been made redundant as a result of abolishing the NHS internal market. [120332]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 2 May 2000]: The information is not available in the form requested. However, total National Health Service management costs in 1998–99 prices are shown in the table.

Year	£ million
1996–97	1,949
1997–98	1,846
1997–98	[1]1,928
1998–99	1,870
1999–2000	[2]1,816

[1] Rebased. The definition of management costs was revised for 1998–99 to capture some management activity previously excluded, mainly related to NHS trusts purchasing private sector support services. To provide a consistent time series, the 1997–98 figure was rebased on the new definition

GM Crops (Honey)

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what advice his Department has prepared for beekeepers wishing to produce pure honey whose hives are located in the proximity of genetically modified crop plantings; [120695]

(2) what compensation he pays to beekeepers who are prevented from describing honey produced by their bees as pure, by the proximity of genetically modified crop plantings; [120698]

(3) how far beehives need to be located away from a genetically modified crop planting to ensure that the honey produced complies with labelling regulations for the use of the description pure. [120697]

Ms Stuart: There is no existing legislation which defines the use of the word "pure" in food labelling.

However in October 1999 officials in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food/Department of Health Joint Food Safety and Standards Group wrote to the British Beekeepers Association and the British Honey Importers and Packers Association advising them that the presence of GM pollen in honey does not effect the labelling of honey. I am placing copies of the letters in the Library.

Work carried out by the Laboratory of the Government Chemist, a report of which is also available in the Library, indicates that the amount of genetically modified material in honey that might arise from bees foraging on GM crops is likely to be extremely small.

Hospital Hygiene

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Health on how many occasions in the last five years the Audit Commission has investigated the administration of hospitals, with particular reference to hygiene. [120988]

Mr. Denham: The Audit Commission has informed us that according to its records neither the Commission nor its appointed auditors have carried out any investigations specifically concerned with hygiene in the last five years.

Diabetes Services

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the Audit Commission's report, "Testing Times: A Review of Diabetes Services in England and Wales"; and what actions he proposes to take. [R] [121124]

Mr. Denham: We welcome this important report. It highlights unacceptable variations in the quality of diabetes services. It is those variations that prompted us to announce last year the development of a National Service Framework for diabetes in England. The National Service Framework will set national standards and define service models to improve the quality of care for people with diabetes.

We have sent copies of the Audit Commission report to members of the Expert Reference Group who will advise Ministers on the development of the National Service Framework and it will inform their work.

General Osteopathic Council

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many members of the General Osteopathic Council have been drawn from (a) the General Council of Registered Osteopaths, (b) the College of Osteopaths, (c) the Guild of Osteopaths, (d) the London Counties and Shires Physicians, (e) the SMAE Institute, (f) the British and European Osteopaths Association and (g) the NTOS; how the members of the council were chosen and by whom; and if he will make a statement. [121105]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 8 May 2000]: All members of the current General Osteopathic Council have been appointed by the Privy Council in accordance with our adopted policy on public appointments. Members have been chosen on the basis of individual merit and particularly for their ability to secure and maintain the highest standards of training, clinical practice and professional conduct. Professional members of the General Osteopathic Council do not represent any individual osteopathic body or training institution but act as ambassadors for the whole of the osteopathic profession.

Following legal advice, nominations for each professional place on the Council have been sought from all bodies known to have a representative function for osteopaths. For the initial membership selection exercise, these were the bodies identified by the King's Fund

Working Party on Osteopathy (whose report in 1991 provided the basis of the Osteopaths Act 1993) and known still to be in existence. The bodies were:

The British Osteopathic Association

The British and European Osteopathic Association

The College of Osteopaths Practitioners Association and Register

The General Council and Register of Osteopaths

The Guild of Osteopaths

The Natural Therapeutic and Osteopathic Society and Register.

The King's Fund Working Party drew its list from a report of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission on the Services of professionally regulated osteopaths (1989).

The claims to have a representative function of bodies which have come forward since the initial selection exercise have been considered on a case by case basis. The London Counties and Shires Physicians has not made any claims to Government to represent osteopaths. Nominations have not been accepted from the SMAE Institute on the basis that it is considered to be a training establishment and not a representative body. Nominations have, however, been accepted from the newly formed British Osteopathic Association and the General Osteopathic Council itself.

ME and MS

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent representations he has received regarding additional funding for research into the causes of, and cure for, (a) ME and (b) MS; and if he will make a statement. [121353]

Yvette Cooper: The information is as follows:

Chronic fatigue syndrome/myalgic encephalomyelitis (CFS/ME)

We have recently received representations in the form of Ministerial correspondence about provision for research into, and treatment of, myalgic encephalomyelitis (ME), also known as chronic fatigue syndrome (CFS), and the perceived lack of research into diagnosis and treatment for this condition.

The National Health Service research and development programme is currently supporting the following research projects on CFS/ME:

A systematic review to determine the clinical effectiveness of treatments and interventions for Chronic Fatigue Syndrome/ME—University of York

Family Focused Cognitive Behavioural Therapy for Adolescents with Chronic Fatigue Syndrome—King's College School of Medicine, London

Chronic Fatigue Syndrome after Acute Q Fever: A follow-up study of the 1989 outbreak cohort—Birmingham Heartlands Hospital, Birmingham

A randomised controlled trial of cognitive behaviour therapy for chronic fatigue syndrome—GKT School Medical School, London.

Multiple Sclerosis (MS)

The Department has recently received a large amount of correspondence from the public asking that additional funding be made available for research into the causes of and cure for multiple sclerosis (MS). There has also been some Ministerial correspondence and a Parliamentary Question which asked about treatment and research into multiple sclerosis during 1999.

The Medical Research Council supported about a dozen projects on multiple sclerosis and associated demyelinating diseases in 1998–99 representing a spend of approximately £640,000 in that year.

The Department funds research to support policy and the delivery of effective practice in the National Health Service. The Department is currently spending approximately £150,000 per year on projects related to MS.

In addition, we have awarded the MS Society £15,000 per year from 1997–98 until 1999–2000 under the Section 64 scheme of grants, for their emerging therapies project.

Defibrillators

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the locations of the defibrillators to be placed in public locations in (a) Shrewsbury and Atcham and (b) Shropshire. [121292]

Yvette Cooper: Our scheme to provide life-saving heart defibrillators in public places was launched in April 2000. 700 defibrillators will be placed in railway stations, shopping centres, airports and bus stations across the country over the next year. Additional large public areas are currently being identified as potential sites.

We do not yet have details of the exact locations of the defibrillators, nor of the implications for Shrewsbury and Atcham or Shropshire.

Royal Shrewsbury Hospital

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the Royal Shrewsbury Hospital's people management standards document issued to staff. [121291]

Mr. Denham: Ministers welcome and want to encourage examples of good practice in the National Health Service. The Royal Shrewsbury Hospital's people management standards document, which identifies how staff can expect to be treated by the trust, supports our key priority of improving the working lives of NHS staff.

Asthma

Angela Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans his Department has to undertake further research into air pollution and asthma. [120159]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 9 May 2000]: The prevention and treatment of asthma are high priority topics within the Department's research programmes. The Department's Policy Research Programme has been funding for some years a programme of research on the public health aspects of asthma, aimed at providing a clearer scientific understanding of the causes of asthma and hence how it might be prevented. One of the major strands of research within this programme relates to studies on the effects of outdoor air pollution on patients with asthma. This work is currently funded until the end of the year, but it has been agreed to extend this contract for a further period and consideration is now being given to continuing the programme for a further five years.

The Department has also funded a number of research projects that consider the possible effects of both indoor and outdoor pollution on asthma and respiratory disease. Many of these projects are still in progress and will continue over the next few years.

CJD

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance his Department has issued to NHS trust and social services departments on the care to be offered to those suffering from new variant CJD. [121137]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 10 May 2000]: Health Service Circular 1999/178 issued to National Health Service trusts, primary care groups, and others in August 1999, among other things drew attention to the resources available to health professionals when dealing with the care of patients suffering from all forms of CJD. The CJD Support Network, in collaboration with the Association of Directors of Social Services, has published good practice guidelines for social services professionals who care for variant CJD patients. In addition, we will shortly be publishing some new guidance intended for healthcare professionals. It will mention the importance of having a named 'key worker' in place after any diagnosis of CJD, whose role will be to co-ordinate all professional care. The National CJD Surveillance Unit, funded directly by the Department, also employs a care co-ordinator, to act as a source of advice and expertise to health care professionals.

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the average cost of caring for a patient suffering from new variant CJD. [121139]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 10 May 2000]: The cost of caring for a patient suffering from variant Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease (vCJD) varies considerably from case to case, but is generally considered to be in line with the cost of caring for a wide range of other terminally and chronically ill patients.

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to ensure that general practitioners are aware of the presenting symptoms of new variant CJD. [121138]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 10 May 2000]: The initial symptoms of variant CJD can be similar to much more common illnesses, and it is therefore difficult to diagnose the disease in its early stages. General practitioners presented with neurological or psychiatric symptoms in a patient would, however, be expected to refer such patients as necessary in the normal way to appropriate specialists, including neurologists. The National CJD Surveillance Unit, funded directly by the Department, keeps in regular touch with neurologists about CJD issues and has circulated to them details of those symptoms which would suggest that a case should be referred to the Unit for further investigation. In addition, the Unit disseminates information about variant CJD through the medical literature.

Oncologists

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many cancer units have a medical oncologist; [121691]

(2) which cancer centres are without (a) a clinical oncologist and (b) a medical oncologist. [121641]

Yvette Cooper: The Calman/Hine report published in 1995 emphasised the importance of the integration of the work of cancer units with a cancer centre. Each cancer unit should have in place arrangements for non-surgical input (medical and clinical oncologists) into services. Local arrangements will depend on cancer site specialisation by the oncologist and the cancer unit, but sufficient time must be available in the cancer unit to guarantee a firm commitment to those local oncology services. Consequently individual clinicians may work in more than one trust.

Results from the medical workforce census for England show that at 30 September 1999 there were (a) 700 clinical oncologists employed by 80 National Health Service trusts and (b) 380 medical oncologists employed by 70 NHS trusts.

National Register for Clinical Trials

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the National Register for Clinical Trials has been established. [121690]

Ms Stuart: Details of research projects undertaken in the National Health Service are currently made available on the National Research Register, funded by the Department. The NRR has over 50,000 records and is available on CD-ROM and on line. To improve the information on clinical trials, the Department and the NHS are currently working in collaboration with its research partners to develop a national register of all funded clinical trials.

Cancer Services

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many cancer units and cancer centres fully comply with the Calman-Hine cancer guidelines; [121643]

(2) how many cancer units are related to each cancer centre; [121642]

(3) how many cancer centres there are in the UK; and if he will list them. [121640]

Yvette Cooper: The Calman/Hine report, "A Policy Framework for Cancer Care Services", recommended that networks of care should be developed encompassing primary care, cancer units and cancer centres. The report provided a broad framework for the development of cancer units and cancer centres, but it did not set explicit standards for their development. Early implementation of the Calman/Hine recommendations reflected the different starting points across the country and allowed an evaluation of services to fit local needs.

Regional cancer co-ordinators from six of the eight health regions have identified cancer networks based on geographical patches shown in the table.

The National Cancer Director and regional offices are working with the National Health Service to develop this model on a more consistent basis, in line with best care set out in evidence based guidance. We intend to consult shortly on national standards for cancer which will permit a consistent approach to evaluation of cancer services.

Parkinson's Disease

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if implant surgery for people with Parkinson's Disease is available throughout the country; and what the waiting times for such surgery are in each health authority area. [120642]

Mr. Denham: Patients in England with severe Parkinson's disease are usually under the care of neurologists. If, in their neurologist's opinion, neurosurgery may improve their disease then they can refer to specialist neurosurgical centres dealing with Parkinson's disease.

There are at least eight centres in England carrying out implant surgery and a further eight at least doing neurosurgery for Parkinson's disease.

Implant surgery for Parkinson's disease is complex and highly specialist and relatively new. It should be noted that the relative merits of implants in Parkinson's disease compared to drugs or more conventional surgery have not been thoroughly tested as yet. There are therefore sound reasons for limiting the number of centres where this service can be accessed until such time as its effectiveness is fully established.

Officials are currently working with health authorities to develop the most appropriate commissioning framework for this service.

Waiting times are as follows. As this is a rare operation not all health authorities have patients waiting.

Waiting time statistics from Hospital Episode Statistics (HES) are not the same as the published waiting list statistics. HES provides counts and waiting times for all patients admitted to hospital within a given period whereas the published waiting list statistics count those waiting for treatment at a given point in time and how long they have been on the waiting list. Also, HES calculates the waiting time as the difference between the admission and the decision to admit dates. Unlike published waiting list statistics, this is not adjusted for self-deferrals or periods of medical/social suspension.

TREASURY

EU Contract Compliance

Mr. Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what Government department is responsible for assessing the tendering of contracts within each European member country to ensure that each Government complies with EU law. [121620]

Mr. Andrew Smith: It is the European Commission which monitors the tendering of public contracts in the European Union. Where appropriate, the Commission enforces compliance through proceedings against the member state in the European Court of Justice. Firms harmed by a breach of EC law can also seek remedies under national review systems which member states are required to establish. The Department of Trade and Industry's "Action Single Market" can assist UK firms who meet problems in other member states.

Insurance Industry (Gender Discrimination)

Mr. Baker: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his policy on permitting discrimination between consumers by the insurance industry on the grounds of gender. [121510]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Government's view is that insurers can best service their customers by pricing policies selectively and competitively on the basis of an informed actuarial assessment of risk.

Service Company Workers

Mr. Russell Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the tax position of service company workers overseas. [122226]

Dawn Primarolo: Many other countries have rules that are similar to IR35 which discourage the use of service companies to disguise employment. Others are developing such rules at the present time.

In some countries, a worker will be worse off than if they had stayed in the UK and fallen within IR35. These include Norway, Belgium and Germany.

In the US, a service company worker may achieve a marginally higher level of take home pay, but this will be eroded by the additional expense of items such as health care insurance.

In the Netherlands, a service company worker will be substantially worse off than in the UK. The Netherlands do have a generous tax regime for IT workers, but this regime applies only to those who work properly as employees and not to those who work through service companies.

EU Budget

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the average daily cost of the United Kingdom's net contribution to the European Union budget over the last three years. [121451]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The United Kingdom's net contribution in each of the year's 1996–97 to 1998–99, the latest three years for which outturn data are available, can be found at Table 13a, page 120, of the Departmental Report of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Departments (Cm 4615) published on 7 April 2000.

Demutualisation

Dr. Cable: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) when and in what form the report of the Government Actuary and the Financial Services Authority into the demutualisation of Standard Life will be published; [121046]

(2) if he will make a statement on the Government Actuary's duty to safeguard reasonable expectations of existing policyholders in the case of demutualisation of life insurers; [121048]

Miss Melanie Johnson: There is no specific procedure for demutualisation laid down in insurance legislation. In practice, a mutual life insurer proposing to demutualise normally transfers its insurance business to a proprietary company. Such a transfer of business requires court approval under the procedure in Schedule 2C to the Insurance Companies Act 1982. An independent actuary's report on the terms of the scheme is considered by the court. Anyone, including policyholders, with an interest can be heard by the court, as the regulator. If demutualisation is achieved, there is no statutory role for the Government Actuary in the process, but the regulator decides whether to make representations to the court or take any other action after appropriate actuarial advice. One important factor which is addressed is the safeguarding of policyholders' reasonable expectations.

There is no formal proposal before the court to demutualise Standard Life.

Royal Fleet Auxiliary

Mr. Prosser: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he expects to respond to the submission made by the Ministry of Defence on behalf of the Royal Fleet Auxiliary in respect of the current annual pay review for its seagoing officers and ratings. [121363]

Mr. Andrew Smith: I have just done so.

Mr. Prosser: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will ensure that future submissions made by the Ministry of Defence on behalf of the Royal Fleet Auxiliary in respect of annual pay reviews will be responded to in time for the annual pay negotiations to be concluded by the agreed anniversary date. [121364]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Our aim is to respond within three weeks of receipt, unless additional information is required.

Household Statistics

Mr. Leigh: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what percentage of families with dependent children are headed by (a) married couples, (b) cohabiting couples and (c) a lone parent by each type; [121365]

(2) what percentage of dependent children live in families which are headed by (a) a married couple, (b) a cohabiting couple, (c) a parent who has never married, (d) a widowed parent, (e) a divorced parent and (f) a separated parent. [121366]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from John Pullinger to Mr. Edward Leigh, dated 11 May 2000:

The Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS) has been asked to reply to your recent questions on dependent children and the marital status of heads of families. I am replying in the Director's absence.

Estimates of marital status and family composition are available from the Labour Force Survey (LFS) household datasets, which are available for the spring and autumn quarters of each year. The latest available LFS estimates of dependent children and the marital status of heads of family units are for the autumn (September to November) quarter of 1999 and are given in the tables attached.

The first table gives non-seasonally adjusted LFS estimates of dependent children by the marital status of the head of family unit, the second gives estimate of families with dependent children, again by the marital status of the head of family unit.

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from John Pullinger to Mr. Edward Leigh, dated 11 May 2000:

The Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS) has been asked to reply to your recent question about the usual gross weekly household income according to the status of the head of the household. I am replying in the Director's absence.

The attached table shows data from the General Household Survey. The GHS is a continuous, multi-purpose survey based on a random sample of the general population resident in private households in Great Britain. It has been carried out by the Social Survey Division of ONS since 1971, and is commissioned by a number of Government Departments and is widely used for policy and planning purposes.

Interviewing took place during the period April 1998 to March 1999. Interviewers collected information from 15,853 adults aged 16 and over in 8,636 households.

Mr. Leigh: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the percentage of women with a child aged (a) four years or under, (b) between five and nine years and (c) between 10 and 15 years who (i) work full-time, (ii) work part-time, (iii) are unemployed and (iv) are economically inactive. [121325]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from John Pullinger to Mr. Edward Leigh, dated 11 May 2000:

The Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS) has been asked to reply to your recent question about the economic status of women with young children. I am replying in the Director's absence.

Estimates of economic status are available from the Labour Force Survey (LFS) which is the major ONS source of labour market data on individuals. The table attached gives non-seasonally adjusted LFS estimates of the economic status of women of working age (16–59 years) with young children in the winter (December to February) quarter of 1999–2000.

People aged 16 or over are classed as in employment by the LFS if they have done at least one hour of paid work (as an employee or self-employed) in the week prior to their LFS interview or if they are temporarily away from their current job. People who do unpaid work in a family business and people on Government-supported training and employment programmes are also included according to the International Labour Organisation convention.

Classification by whether a person works full or part-time is based on the respondent's own assessment.

The measure of unemployment derived from the LFS is defined on a consistent and internationally recognised basis set out by the International Labour Organisation (ILO). It counts as unemployed people who are a) without a paid job, b) available to start work within the next two weeks and c) have either looked for work in the last four weeks or are waiting to start a job already obtained.

People aged 16 or over are classed as economically inactive by the LFS if they are not in employment and do not satisfy the criteria for ILO unemployment. This includes those who want a job but who have not been seeking work in the last 4 weeks, those who are seeking work but are not available to start and those who do not want a job (for example, students not working or seeking work).

[1] There is no such thing as an 'official exchange rate'. Exchange rates vary during the day and depending on what time you measure them will influence any average rate calculated. The Bank of England measures representative exchange rates in the London interbank market every day at around 4pm. These rates are the spot middle market rates i.e. The difference between the bid rate (what a bank will sell currency to you at) and the offer rate (what bank will buy a currency from you at) for spot) i.e. Today-but may settle in two to seven days time).

GDP

Mr. Gill: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total gross domestic product in 1999. [121411]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from John Kidgell to Mr. Christopher Gill, dated 11 May 2000:

The Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS) has been asked to reply to your recent question on Gross Domestic Product (GDP). I am replying in the Director's absence.

The most recently published data for annual GDP was released on the 27th of March 2000. GDP at current market prices for 1999 was £889,874 million, an increase of 5.0% on the previous year. GDP at 1995 constant market prices for 1999 was £788,729 million, an increase of 2.1% on the previous year.

Pension Contributions (Tax Relief)

Mr. Paice: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the effect is on the maximum pension contributions eligible for tax relief for (a) the employer and (b) the employee if a pay increase is (i) compulsorily staged by the employer and (ii) voluntarily foregone by the employee. [121369]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 9 May 2000]: In broad terms, tax relievable pension contributions that an employee may pay are based on a percentage of taxable earnings received for a year of assessment.

The treatment of employer contributions depends on the type of pension scheme. With tax approved occupational pension schemes, the employer's contributions are set by the scheme actuary according to the level of benefits promised by the scheme. For a personal pension scheme, total contributions by the employee and employer combined must not exceed an age-related percentage of the employee's taxable earnings for the year.

Public Service Agreements

Mr. Portillo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much (a) has been spent since May 1997 and (b) is projected to be spent in the next 12 months on measures to meet Public Service Agreement targets. [121012]

Mr. Andrew Smith [holding answer 5 May 2000]: The Public Service Agreements published following the 1998 Comprehensive Spending Review (CSR) set out the outputs and outcomes the Government are seeking to achieve with the resources allocated for the CSR period. Those spending plans can be found in the CSR White Paper published in July 1998 (Cm 4011).

Mr. Portillo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many public service agreement targets (a) have been met in full, (b) are on course to be met and (c) have been abandoned. [121013]

Mr. Andrew Smith [holding answer 5 May 2000]: A full report of progress against PSA targets has been included in each Department's Annual Report, recently published jointly with the Treasury.

Mr. Portillo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many public service agreement targets have been set to date. [121016]

Mr. Andrew Smith [holding answer 5 May 2000]: The Government's White Paper "Public Services for the Future: Modernisation, Reform, Accountability" (Cm 4181, December 1998), with the supplement published in March 1999 (Cm 4315), set out all of the Public Service Agreements agreed following the Comprehensive Spending Review of 1998.

ISAs

Mr. Portillo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the number of people who (a) hold and (b) have held a mini ISA and a maxi ISA simultaneously. [121014]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 5 May 2000]: The Inland Revenue currently has no estimates of this kind. However, compliance checks are undertaken after the end of the tax year, based on ISA managers' annual information returns. Estimates based on these returns will be available later in the year.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what studies his Department has (a) undertaken, (b) commissioned and (c) reviewed on the efficiency of the Private Finance Initiative; and if he will make a statement. [120925]

Mr. Andrew Smith [holding answer 5 May 2000]: The Treasury has commissioned two reports on PFI, focusing on the efficiency of the PFI process. These were the first and second reviews of PFI Policy undertaken by Sir Malcolm Bates in the Spring/Summer of 1997 and in the Spring/Summer of 1999. These were published respectively on 23 June 1997 and on 22 July 1999.

In June 1999, the Treasury Taskforce commissioned Arthur Andersen to undertake a study of value for money in a range of operational PFI projects. The results of the findings were published on 17 January 2000 in "Value for Money Drivers in the Private Finance Initiative".

Copies of all these reports were placed in the Library of the House.

The Treasury has also published Public Private Partnerships: The Government's Approach on 15 March 2000.

London Stock Exchange Merger

Mr. Cash: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received on the proposed merger of the London Stock Exchange and the Deutsche Börse; and if he will make a statement. [121671]

Miss Melanie Johnson: None. The terms of the proposed merger are a matter for the parties involved, subject to their securing the necessary approval of the relevant regulatory and competition authorities.

Investment Services Directive

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what consultation the Government have had on the proposed reform of the Investment Services Directive. [121669]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The European Commission's Communication "Implementing the Framework for Financial Markets: Action Plan" (COM(1999)232) includes a proposal for a Commission Green Paper on upgrading the Investment Services Directive.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Court Service

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what are the key performance targets for the Court Service Executive Agency for 2000–01. [122147]

Jane Kennedy: The table sets out the key performance targets that the Lord Chancellor has set for the Court Service for 2000–01.

	Performance indicator	Target 2000–01
KPI 1	The quality of service provided to court users	85 per cent.
KPI 2	The percentage of administrative work in the civil courts processed within target time	94 per cent.
KPI 3	The percentage of Crown Court cases that commence within target	78 per cent.
KPI 4	Average waiting time for asylum appeals from receipt at the Immigration Appellate Authority to promulgation of the Adjudicator's decision	16 weeks
KPI 5	The percentage of the cost of the civil courts recovered through fees	94 per cent.

Community Legal Service

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department for what reason at the launch of the new Community Legal Service an actress was used to portray the legal needs of poor women on video. [121673]

Mr. Lock: Actors were used to preserve client confidentiality because the video illustrated real case histories provided by advice workers. It was made clear, at the time of the launch, that actors were used when the video was introduced in order to illustrate and explain these issues.

Family Law

Mr. Lepper: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement on the timetable for the Government's response to the recommendations of the Advisory Board on Family Law Children Act Sub-Committee on (a) good practice guidelines for courts in relation to parental contact in cases where there is domestic violence and (b) training for the Court Welfare Service and the judiciary in understanding the effects of domestic violence on children and parents. [121317]

Jane Kennedy: The Lord Chancellor welcomes the Report on Contact between Children and Violent Parents from the Children Act Sub-Committee of the Advisory Board on Family Law. He agreed to make the report available in draft to the Court of Appeal so that it could consider the proposed guidelines in four appeals on this subject which were heard in March and on which judgment has been reserved. Once judgment in those cases has been given, the Lord Chancellor will consider with the President of the Family Division what further action may be necessary. The Family Court Welfare Service is currently the responsibility of the Home Office but I understand that induction for family court welfare officers addresses the issue of domestic violence. As part of the development of the new Children and Family Court Advisory and Support Service (CAFCASS), which will fall within the responsibility of the Lord Chancellor's Department, current training arrangements are being reviewed, with a view to identifying developments and improvements for the new service. Judicial training is the responsibility of the Judicial Studies Board which already provides core training on domestic violence.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Ministerial Speech (Association of British Insurers)

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will place in the Library a copy of his recent speech to the Association of British Insurers. [121526]

Mr. Darling: My remarks to the annual dinner of the Association of British Insurers were not delivered from a prepared text.

Stakeholder Pensions

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if stakeholder pensions are intended for (a) moderate and high earners and (b) low earners. [121527]

Mr. Darling: The Pensions Green Paper "A new contract for welfare: partnership in pensions", published in December 1998, set out that stakeholder pension schemes will be open to everyone.

Stakeholder pensions are primarily intended for moderate earners—those earning between about £10,000 and £20,000 a year—but many higher earners will also be able to take advantage of the lower charges, greater flexibility, and simpler tax regime which stakeholder pension schemes will introduce.

The Green Paper also describes our proposals to introduce the State Second Pension. This will specifically benefit low earners on incomes of less than £10,000 a year.

IT Procurement

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list each item of IT procurement with a value over £10,000 agreed with Electronic Data Systems by his Department since 1 May 1997; when each contact was agreed; when the delivery began; when the system became fully operational; and if the system is still in use. [121622]

Angela Eagle: I refer my right hon. Friend to the written answers provided by the Chief Executive of the Child Support Agency, Faith Boardman on 5 May 2000, Official Report, columns 253–54W, and the former Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency, Peter Mathison on 18 April 2000, Official Report, columns 551–52W. These replies set out the current departmental position on IT procurements agreed with EDS since 1 May 1997.

ONE Service

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what percentage of the women who have used the single work-focused gateway were (a) single mothers, (b) married, (c) widows and (d) carers; and what steps have been taken to ensure that staff who operate this service are trained to give the proper advice to each category of women; [121099]

(2) what proportion of the clients who have used the single work-focused gateway have been women in the pilot projects in (a) Great Britain and (b) Clyde Coast and Renfrew. [121101]

Angela Eagle: Currently, the information we collect from the ONE pilot offices is not broken down by gender or marital status.

Currently, the information we collect is not broken down by gender. Neither is information on marital status collected.

However, in the first seven months, the basic model ONE service was used over 72,000 times to make a claim to benefit. Over 60,000 of these were claims for Jobseeker's Allowance (JSA). Of the non-JSA claims, around 22 per cent. were claims for Income Support for lone parents, and around 8 per cent. were claims for other benefits including Widows' Benefit and Invalid Care Allowance.

ONE Personal Advisers receive individual tailored training through the ONE Learning Assessment Framework which has been specifically designed to match training provision with the individual training needs of staff. The Framework will be used by staff to review their learning needs and assess their competence development, which will provide them with the knowledge and skills needed to deal professionally with all ONE clients, including lone parents, widows and carers.

State Pension

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Poplar and Canning Town of 11 April 2000, Official Report, column 144W, on the state pension, what assumptions underlay his answer regarding future rates of increase in prices and earnings and increases in take-up of income support. [121194]

Mr. Rooker: The information is in the table.

	April 1998	April 1999	April 2000	April 2001
Price uprating of RP (based on previous September RPI)	3.6	3.2	1.1	3.4
Earnings uprating of RP (based on previous September AEI)	4.1	4.9	4.4	4.3
Earnings uprating of the MIG (based on three months to previous July AEI)	—	—	4.6	4.9

Notes:

1. The minimum income guarantee (MIG) is uprated by average earnings index (AEI), based on an average of three months to July of the previous year. Actual AEI used for April 2000 uprating and an assumption for 2001 uprating. It is assumed that the take-up rate of the MIG remains broadly constant. Therefore any effects of this year's take-up campaign are not included.

2: The assumptions for Retirement Pension are actual price uprating to April 2000, based on previous September's Retail Prices Index (RPI), and an estimate of September 2000 RPI for 2001 uprating. Earnings uprating is based on previous September's average earnings figures up to April 2000, with an estimate of September 2000 earnings for April 2001 uprating.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Housing Improvement Agencies

Sir Paul Beresford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 30 March 2000, Official Report, column 228W, on housing improvement agencies, what previous experience Collective Enterprises Ltd. has had in administering Government grants; and on what basis he determined that CEL possessed (a) broad-based expertise in housing and care issues, (b) the capacity to support individual agencies and their managing agents across England and (c) the ability to deliver services from a position of independence and impartiality. [121844]

Mr. Mullin: Officials of my Department and the Department of Health evaluated the tenders received from Care and Repair England Ltd. and Collective Enterprises Ltd. (CEL) against a range of criteria, including those mentioned by the hon. Member, and recommended that CEL's tender as a whole offered a more effective approach to the delivery of the requirements of the national co-ordinating role. My Department's contract with CEL does not require them to administer the system of grants to individual home improvement agencies.

Environment Agency

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what the average fine imposed on businesses prosecuted by the Environment Agency was in each of the last three years; [121843]

(2) how many businesses were successfully prosecuted by the Environment Agency in each of the last three years. [121842]

Mr. Mullin: The Environment Agency publishes prosecution statistics in its annual reports. Although these figures do not distinguish between companies and individuals, and it would cause disproportionate cost to do so here, most prosecutions are against businesses. The 1999–2000 annual report will be laid before Parliament in July. Figures for the previous two years are as follows.

Function/year	Number of prosecutions	Average fine (£)
Water Quality
1997–98	222	4,258
1998–99	258	6,157
Waste
1997–98	313	1,999
1998–99	301	1,060
Integrated Pollution Control
1997–98	12	18,375
1998–99	16	11,000
Radioactive Substances
1997–98	3	11,000
1998–99	3	37,666
Water Resources
1997–98	17	4,576
1998–99	21	2,159
Flood Defence
1997–98	1	2,850
1998–99	4	1,387
Navigation
1997–98	31	118
1998–99	43	162

The average fines for Water Quality offences in 1998–99 has been adjusted to reflect the reduction in the amount the Milford Haven Harbour Authority was fined for its part in the Sea Empress disaster. On appeal the fine was reduced from £4 million to £750,000.

Urban Design

Angela Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will publish good practice guidance on urban design in the planning system. [122345]

Mr. Raynsford: The good practice guidance we have prepared in partnership with the Commission for Architecture and the Built Environment will be published on Monday 15 May. Copies of "By Design. Urban design in the Planning System; towards better practice" will be placed in the Library of the House.

"By Design" will form a key part of the Government's strategy for promoting better urban design in the planning and development system. It provides sound, practical advice on how to implement the Government's commitment to good design as set out in Planning Policy Guidance, in particular PPG1 "General Policy and Principles" and PPG3 "Housing". It also reinforces the call in the Urban Task Force's report "Towards an Urban Renaissance" for earlier, greater and better-informed attention to urban design.

Regional Development Agencies

Angela Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what the total budget is for each of the regional development agencies for 2000–01; and if he will break it down in each case by programme. [122460]

Ms Armstrong: The budgets of the regional development agencies for 2000–01 are as follows.

	NE	NW	YH	EM	WM	E	SE	SW	Total

Rail Schemes

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what his policy is on checking the reliability of privately-produced studies of proposed rail schemes, with particular reference to Virgin Trains' commercial study of electrification of the North Wales main line. [121839]

Mr. Hill: The Franchising Director would normally verify the accuracy of any privately produced railway study, using external consultants where necessary. Virgin Trains' study was presented to the former Office of Passenger Rail Franchising (now the shadow Strategic Rail Authority), and the Franchising Director judged its conclusions to be valid, having considered it in line with the organisation's process of due diligence.

Departmental Inquiries

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 18 April 2000, Official Report, column 444W, which of the reviews, public inquiries and commissions of inquiry listed have been carried out by paid appointees; who are the paid appointees; and what is their level of remuneration. [121845]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The information requested is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

London Underground

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on (a) train, (b) signal and (c) track failures in each financial year since 1994–95 for each line of the London Underground and the cumulative figures for all lines. [119670]

Mr. Hill: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to his earlier question on 21 December 1999, Official Report, column 523–24W. London Underground has provided the figures for the extra years which have been requested and these are included in the table, along with the figures for the full year 1999–2000.

	Service disruption due to failures in:
	Trains	Signal/points	Other track
1994–95	16,126	2,349	659
1995–96	15,102	2,494	959
1996–97	14,873	2,323	1,007
1997–98	18,088	2,827	907
1998–99	20,159	2,756	869
1999–2000	16,216	2,626	909

These figures show a significant reduction in train failures in 1999–2000 compared with the previous year. This is attributable to the new or refurbished stock now available on the Northern, Jubilee and Piccadilly lines. The reduction of signal or points failure in 1999–2000 compared with the two previous years reflects investment and maintenance work enabled by the additional funding provided by the Government.

Air Traffic Control

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions which EU member states have privatised their air traffic control facilities in the last five years. [121295]

Mr. Mullin: No state in Europe has privatised its main air traffic control service provider. However, a number of states are, like the UK, looking at ways to commercialise their service providers and at how to introduce new management expertise and financing into the provision of air traffic control.

Noise Mitigation Schemes

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will instruct the Highways Agency to add to the list of possible noise mitigation schemes, published in the Official Report on 11 November 1999, columns 681–83W, (a) the A46 at Harvington and (b) the M5 at Whittington. [121313]

Mr. Hill: No. Neither location meets the criteria established in the announcement of 22 March 1999 to determine whether the need for noise remedial measures should be studied in further detail. The A46 at Harvington carries far less traffic than would generate a roadside noise level of 80dB (A). The M5 at Whittington was improved more recently than 1988 and noise mitigation measures were provided in accordance with current standards.

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will review the criteria for potential road noise mitigation schemes published on 22 March 1999 to include roads built or widened after 1988. [121314]

Mr. Hill: The purpose of the policy is to focus attention on cases where people may not have had the benefit of noise mitigation measures provided in accordance with current standards. These standards were introduced in 1988 and it is not appropriate to review schemes where noise mitigation was designed within those standards.

Camping

Mr. Todd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what powers he has to recover the cost to the community of site clearance and waste disposal caused by unauthorised camping. [121297]

Mr. Mullin: Under section 59(8) of the Environmental Protection Act 1990, the Environment Agency or local authority is entitled to recover its costs incurred from any person who made, or knowingly caused or permitted, the illegal deposit of any waste.

Housing (Multiple Occupation)

Ms Drown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will introduce licensing legislation in respect of houses in multiple occupation in England and Wales. [121776]

Mr. Mullin: We will introduce the necessary primary legislation as soon as Parliamentary time can be found. Key conclusions and a summary of responses to our 1999 consultation paper for England will be published in due course.

European Research Area

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what communications he has received on the proposed establishment of a European research area; and how much money the Community has spent in the United Kingdom for research projects chosen by the European Community. [121633]

Ms Hewitt: I have been asked to reply.

The Commission issued a Communication "Towards a European Research Area" [COM (00)6] on 18 January 2000. An explanatory memorandum on this Communication was deposited in the House of Commons and House of Lords on the 17 March 2000. It is expected that at its meeting on 15 June the Research Council will adopt a Council Resolution as a formal response to this Communication.

The European Community's main instrument for funding scientific research and development is the Framework Programme. This is administered by the European Commission. As a matter of policy the Commission do not publish data showing the amount of funding awarded on a country-by-country basis.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMISSION

Electronic Data Systems

Mr. Field: To ask the Chairman of the Public Accounts Commission if the National Audit Office has (a) a contract and (b) a framework agreement with Electronic Data Systems. [121790]

Mr. Sheldon: The National Audit Office has neither a contract nor a framework agreement with Electronic Data Systems.

CABINET OFFICE

Public Opinion Research

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office when guidance on public opinion research will be published. [122308]

Mr. Ian McCartney: Guidance on Government Research into Public Attitudes and Opinions is being published today. A copy of the guidance has been placed in the Libraries of the House.

Ministerial Red Boxes

Mr. Gray: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office, pursuant to her answer of 2 May 2000, Official Report, column 88W, what is the guidance concerning the carrying of Ministerial Red Boxes on trains; and of what breaches of that guidance she has been notified in the last six months. [121135]

Marjorie Mowlam: Ministerial Red Boxes generally contain official papers or other material which may be sensitive or valuable. Due care therefore needs to be given to their protection when carried on any form of public transport, as set out in the general rules governing the control of such material. There is no requirement to notify me of breaches of the guidance.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Athletics Facilities

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what funding is available from his Department for facilities for the provision of athletics in the area of Bridgnorth District Council. [121355]

Kate Hoey: Funding for athletics is available from a variety of sources. The National Lottery provides funding for facilities across a wide range of different sports, including athletics. The Lottery Sports Fund provides around £200 million to distribute each year. Funding may also be available from other sources including local authorities, Sportsmatch (the Government's business incentive scheme for sport) and the Foundation for Sport and the Arts.

National Lottery

Mr. Davidson: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what data he has collated on differential rates of spending on the National Lottery by different social classes (a) in absolute terms and (b) as percentages of income; if he will publish this data; and if he will make a statement. [120626]

Kate Hoey: The National Lottery Commission supports a social research programme on participation in the National Lottery. Report No. 1 of this programme, published in May 1999, contains data on participation by social class and income category. Copies of this report are being placed in the Libraries of the House today.

Public Library Services

Mr. Geraint Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what guidance he proposes to issue to library authorities about the public library services they should be providing. [122346]

Mr. Chris Smith: I am publishing draft public library standards on Monday 15 May, a day which already marks the celebration of 150 years of public libraries, and I shall be placing copies of those draft standards in the Libraries of the House that morning. Following a wide consultation with library authorities, users, key organisations and other interested people, I hope to publish final standards later in the year and intend that they should then take effect from 1 April 2001.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Ethically Produced Food

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement about her policy on ethically produced food in developing countries, with particular reference to (a) animal welfare standards, (b) employment practices and (c) consequences for the environment. [121840]

Clare Short: The Government support ethical approaches to business and trade, which have an important part to play in promoting sustainable development and in bringing benefits to poor people in developing countries. We take account of animal welfare standards, employment practices and consequences for the environment.

My Department has developed detailed guidelines on the use of animals for any purpose, agricultural or otherwise. These guidelines govern animal welfare standards in all our programmes and projects. They reflect the broad guiding principles that use must be humane and that harms of a certain degree or kind ought under no circumstances to be inflicted on an animal. A copy of these guidelines is being placed in the Library of the House.

We encourage British retailers to examine their global supply chains to ensure they comply with the Core Labour Standards, as set internationally by the ILO within the Declaration of Fundamental Principles and Rights to Work, or can be bettered by voluntary codes of conduct such as SA 8000 or the base code of the Ethical Trading Initiative, which is supported by my Department.

We also Promote better environmental management as a contribution to eliminating poverty. Environmental considerations are integrated throughout our programmes. All projects are screened at the design stage and monitored during implementation for their impact on the environment. My Department supports work to develop and implement a wide array of technologies and approaches that mitigate the impact of food production on the environment in developing countries. We also support efforts to encourage the private sector in developing countries to integrate environmental concerns into decision making by assistance to industry organisations, promotion of industry codes of conduct and environmental auditing standards.

India

Mr. Khabra: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what financial assistance her Department has given to the victims of the disaster in the states of Gujarat and Rajastan in India. [121318]

Clare Short: My Department has provided £500,000 to Oxfam for drought relief activities in Gujarat and Rajastan. We are in close contact with other agencies working in this area and also in the drought affected regions of Pakistan and Afghanistan. We stand ready to respond further to assessed needs.

BP Amoco

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what discussions he has had with BP Amoco concerning their investment in Petro China in relation to its plans to operate in Tibet. [121586]

Mr. Foulkes: Neither I, nor the Secretary of State, have had discussions with BP Amoco concerning their investment in Petro China.

Sierra Leone

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what percentage of the United Kingdom's assistance for security sector reform in Sierra Leone is paid for by (a) her Department and (b) other Government Departments. [121583]

Mr. Foulkes: Assistance provided for security sector reform to date amounts to £1.15 million all of which is to be met by our Department.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on her Department's support for security sector reform in Sierra Leone. [121584]

Mr. Foulkes: Security is a top priority for the poor. Without basic security it is impossible for poor people to build a better life and to work their way out of poverty. During the eight years of civil war in Sierra Leone unaccountable armed forces became part of the security problem. Our Department has been working closely with the Government of Sierra Leone, as well as the World Bank and others to support the disarmament and demobilisation programme as well as supporting wider reform in the security sector including reforms to the military and the police force.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list the projects her Department supports in Sierra Leone, indicating the financial support provided to each. [121585]

Mr. Foulkes: DFID has allocated resources in support of the following projects in Sierra Leone:

	£ million
Support to the Government of Sierra Leone's National Programme for Disarmament, Demobilisation and Reintegration	12.4
Emergency support to Lungi Demobilisation Camp	1.6
Security Sector Project (SILSEP)	1.7
Support to the Commonwealth Police Development Taskforce (includes Police Humanitarian Fund and Public Order support)	2.45
Provision of an Inspector General of Police	0.25
Military Reintegration Plan (MRP)	3.4
Commonwealth Community Safety and Security Project	12.9
Support to Campaign for Good Governance (Civil Society)	0.2
Support for the return of Paramount Chiefs	2.0
Law Development Project (incl. Legal Draftsman)	2.2
Media Development Project	1.1
Governance assistance programme: British Council project management	1.1
Support to the President's office	0.2
Humanitarian Relief and reconstruction	5.0
Budgetary Support for essential services/repayment of debts	20.5
Ferry	1.5

Pakistan

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what recent representations she has received on bonded labour in Pakistan; and if she will make a statement. [121587]

Mr. Foulkes: We receive occasional representations from human rights groups and from individuals.

The Secretary of State's statement to the House of Commons on 10 November 1999, Official Report, column 553W, affirmed the British Government's commitment to the elimination of all forms of forced or compulsory labour, both in the UK and overseas. That continues to be our position.

The practice of forced (or 'bonded') labour remains a problem in Pakistan, notwithstanding the existence of legislation there to outlaw it. Therefore, we take every suitable opportunity to remind the authorities of their obligations to uphold the basic rights of all the Pakistani people, particularly the poor and disadvantaged. It is these groups, inevitably, that are most vulnerable to the perils of 'debt bondage' and 'bonded' employment.

Our Department maintains contact with organisations which are active in campaigning, or in acting against such violations of human rights. We stand ready to support their work in Pakistan if worthwhile opportunities emerge. Meanwhile, we are supporting an innovative programme to phase out child labour from the football manufacturing industry in and around Sialkot.

HEALTH

Meat Hygiene Service

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will instruct the Food Standards Agency to conduct an inquiry into the circumstances surrounding the closure of the Mead Webber Abattoir at Eardisley, with particular reference to the conduct of the Meat Hygiene Service. [121219]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 10 May 2000]: This is a matter for which the Food Standards Agency is responsible. I understand that a formal complaint has been received from Mead Webber Ltd. about the circumstances surrounding the closure of the abattoir, and that it has been agreed by the Food Standards Agency that an independent investigation will be carried out. The most appropriate way of doing this, acceptable to both parties, is being urgently considered, with a view to it starting as soon as possible.

Medical Treatment Abroad

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients have used the E112 procedure to have medical treatment abroad in each of the last five years. [121788]

Ms Stuart: The information requested is as follows:

Year	Number of E112s issued
1995	[1]409
1996	815
1997	859
1998	812
1999	860

[1] Records incomplete

Royal Liverpool Children's NHS Trust

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what decision has been taken with respect to Hilary Rowland's chairmanship of the Royal Liverpool Children's NHS Trust; who took the decision; which Ministers were consulted on this decision; and if he will make a statement. [121787]

Ms Stuart: Hilary Rowland, Chief Executive, is on extended leave from her post at the Royal Liverpool Children's National Health Service Trust after what has been an exceptionally demanding period, both for her and for Alder Hey Children's Hospital. During this time, Ms Rowland remains in contact with regional officials at the NHS Executive North West and has their continuing support.

Human Papilloma Virus Testing

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health for what reason there has been a delay in the selection of pilot sites for human papilloma virus testing. [121784]

Yvette Cooper: The Department is currently establishing an advisory group, which will oversee the commissioning and running of the pilot sites for human papilloma virus testing and provide expert advice and support on all aspects of the scope of the project. A limited competition exercise will be held in the summer to select the pilot sites, and it is anticipated they will be chosen by the autumn. Testing will begin when preparatory work at each site is complete.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Magistrates Courts

Sir Peter Emery: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what estimate he has made of the savings which will result from closing the (a) Axminster and (b) Exmouth magistrates courts. [121785]

Jane Kennedy: None. Under the provisions of the Justices of the Peace Act 1997 the Axminster and Exmouth magistrates courts are managed locally by the Devon and Cornwall Magistrates Courts Committee. Decisions concerning closure are for that Committee to determine, although a contributing local authority may appeal to the Lord Chancellor against a proposed closure. The procedure for such appeals is set out in section 56 of the Act. In the absence of an appeal the Lord Chancellor has no locus in the matter.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Rifle Thefts

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many (a) rifles minus their bolts and (b) complete rifles were stolen from their civilian owners in Northern Ireland in each of the last three years for which figures are available; and of these how many were (i) .22 calibre and (ii) full bore. [121259]

Mr. Ingram: The Chief Constable has advised me that the information is not retained in a manner which readily permits obtaining the detail necessary to answer this question without incurring a disproportionate cost.

Firearms

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many legally held firearms have been destroyed in the last 12 months for which figures are available, as a consequence of the authority to hold such a firearm being (a) withdrawn and (b) given up by the holder; and of those firearms how many were (i) handguns, (ii) rifles of .22 calibre, (iii) rifles over .22 calibre, (iv) shotguns and (v) other firearms. [121258]

Mr. Ingram: The Chief Constable has advised me that the following firearms, legally held on certificate, were destroyed during the period 1 May 1999 to 30 April 2000.

Firearms	Number
Shotguns	1,199
Handguns	414
Rifles	268
Air Rifles	299

It has not been possible to give a more detailed breakdown.

Performance Targets (Social Security)

Mr. Russell Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what performance targets have been set for the Social Security Agency for the current financial year. [122440]

Mr. George Howarth: The following targets have been set with the objective of continuing to provide high levels of service to customers. I am satisfied that the targets represent a demanding challenge for the Agency. The targets will be included in the Agency's 2000–03 Strategic and Business Plan, which is due for publication this month. A copy of the Plan will be placed in the Library. The targets are as follows:

1. Customer Satisfaction

   90 per cent. of customers to regard the Agency's services as satisfactory or better.

2. New Deal initiatives

   To increase the numbers of Lone Parents participating in the scheme by 25 per cent. year on year.

   To have 5 per cent. of those Partners of the Unemployed targeted agree to participate in the scheme.

3. Resource Management

   To achieve cash efficiency savings of the order of £1.4 million.

4. Benefit Accuracy

   Disability Living Allowance—To pay the correct amount in at least 88 per cent. of cases.

   Incapacity Benefit—To pay the correct amount in at least 95 per cent. of cases.

   Income Support—To pay the correct amount in at least 89 per cent. of cases.

   Jobseeker's Allowance—To pay the correct amount in at least 91 per cent. of cases.

5. Fraud

   To achieve a 5 per cent. reduction in the level of fraud and error in Income Support and Jobseeker's Allowance.

6. Financial Recovery

   Recovery of overpayments—£3.7 million.

PRIME MINISTER

Post Office

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Prime Minister when he will publish the Performance and Innovation Unit's report on the social value of rural post offices; and if he will make a statement. [121126]

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Prime Minister when he expects to publish the Performance and Innovation Unit report on the Post Office. [120480]

The Prime Minister: The Performance and Innovation Unit report on the Post Office network will be published shortly.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Evans: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the departments which have spent money directly or indirectly on asylum seekers in the years (a) 1995, (b) 1996, (c) 1997, (d) 1998, (e) 1999 and (f) 2000 to date. [119451]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 17 April 2000]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to him by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary on 9 May 2000, Official Report, columns 332–33W.

Social Exclusion

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Prime Minister if he will define social exclusion. [120672]

The Prime Minister: Social exclusion is a shorthand term for what can happen when people or areas suffer from a combination of linked problems such as unemployment, poor skills, low incomes, poor housing, high crime environments, bad health and family breakdown.

Aircraft

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Prime Minister if he is evaluating proposals for acquiring aircraft for his official use. [118108]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 10 April 2000]: No. As my answer to the hon. Member of 3 April 2000, Official Report, column 279W, made clear, decisions on which aircraft to use will be determined on cost, the numbers of people travelling with me, security and business considerations and the availability of aircraft. There is no dedicated aircraft which is solely for my use.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Zimbabwe

Mr. Ennis: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the Government's policy is on arms sales to Zimbabwe; and if he will make a statement. [122442]

Mr. Robin Cook: The Government's policy on export licence applications for Zimbabwe was set out in my statement to the House of Commons on 3 May 2000, Official Report, columns 149–62.

As I informed the House, the Government decided last week, in the light of the deteriorating situation in Zimbabwe, to refuse from 3 May all applications for new licences for Zimbabwe for goods and technology listed in part III, schedule 1, of the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1994, as amended (commonly known as the Military List).

This included all new licence applications for spare parts in connection with previous contracts. We also began a review of all extant export licences for Zimbabwe.

In line with my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's statement of 9 February 2000, Official Report, columns 184–85W, the Government will not grant export licences for dual-use equipment where there is a clear risk that the equipment would be used in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. Other applications for Standard Individual Export Licences to export dual-use equipment to Zimbabwe will be considered on a case-by-case basis against the national criteria and those in the EU Code of Conduct.

We have now completed the review of extant licences foreshadowed in my statement of 3 May. The Government place considerable importance on UK companies being able to honour their contractual obligations. They do not, therefore, revoke existing licences except in exceptional circumstances. Zimbabwe has now regrettably placed itself in that category. We have, therefore, decided to revoke all extant Standard Individual Export Licences for goods and technology on the Military List (with the possible exception of one extant licence for de-mining equipment already in Zimbabwe) and to remove Zimbabwe as a permitted destination from all Open Individual Export Licences for goods and technology on the Military List.

In addition, Zimbabwe is a permitted destination on four Open General Export Licences (OGELs) and two Open General Transhipment Licences (OGTLs) which allow the export of goods and technology on the Military List. Zimbabwe will now be removed from the coverage of these licences. Amended copies of these licences will be placed in the Library of the House.

We will remove Zimbabwe as a permitted destination from the coverage of extant Open Individual Export Licences for dual-use equipment. Exporters affected by this measure may, however, submit applications for Standard Individual Export Licences for this equipment. Such applications will be considered on a case-by-case basis against the criteria as described above.

We will also be prohibiting transhipment of goods on the Military List to Zimbabwe via the United Kingdom without a licence, by means of an amendment to schedule 3 of the EG(C)O.

The effect of this is that we now have a national arms embargo on Zimbabwe. We will be requesting the Crown Dependencies and Overseas Territories to take the necessary measures to implement the same embargo.

The Government will continue to monitor events in Zimbabwe closely.

China

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Government policy towards China and human rights discussions in the United Nations. [121501]

Mr. Hain: The United Kingdom has a wide-ranging relationship with China. As Permanent Members of the United Nations Security Council we regularly discuss an extensive range of international interests and responsibilities including global and regional security, as well as political, financial, economic and environmental issues.

The UN Commission on Human Rights considered a resolution tabled by the United States on the human rights situation in China on 18 April. We voted against a Chinese sponsored "No-Action" motion to guillotine discussion on a US sponsored resolution. The EU Presidency condemned the continuing restrictions upon the fundamental freedoms of thought, expression, religion, assembly and association. on behalf of the EU, the Presidency also made it clear that it was vital that the human rights dialogue with China should continue and be kept under regular review.

Sri Lanka

Mr. Trend: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last met the High Commissioner of Sri Lanka; and if he will make a statement on the Sri Lankan Government's imposition of emergency regulations on 3 May. [121581]

Mr. Hain: I last met the Sri Lankan High Commissioner on 20 January when he paid a courtesy call on me.

We are concerned by the possible restrictions on civil liberties and press freedoms following the introduction of the regulations by the Sri Lankan Government and hope that they will be lifted as soon as possible. It is not clear how the regulations will be implemented. We shall continue to monitor the situation.

Women Senior Managers

Mr. Baldry: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many women there are in his Department in the top three senior management grades; and what these figures were 10 years ago. [121775]

Mr. Hain: As at 1 April 2000 there were eight women at JESP 13 and above, which equates to Grades 1–3, the top three senior management grades.

In 1990, the Department did not record the gender of those in the most senior grades. Figures for 1990 could therefore only be provided at disproportionate cost.

Women Graduates

Mr. Baldry: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many women graduates recruited into his Department in 1980 are still serving in his Department. [121715]

Mr. Hain: No women were recruited to the FCO in 1980 through the fast stream competition where candidates are required to have a degree. Women graduates may have been recruited into other grades, but in these cases information on whether or not they had a degree was not systematically recorded as possession of a degree was not a requirement for recruitment in most cases.

Iran

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 8 May 2000, Official Report, columns 257–58W, if he raised the issue of legal proceedings concerning members of the Jewish community when he spoke to Iranian Foreign Minister Kharrazi on 28 April regarding the postponement of his visit to Iran; and what factors underlay his decision to postpone the visit. [121674]

Mr. Hain [holding answer 11 May 2000]: Further to my answer of 8 May 2000, Official Report, columns 257–58W, the Foreign Secretary has raised this issue on a number of occasions with Foreign Minister Kharrazi (including when he visited London in January), and with the Iranian ambassador. He did not discuss it or other foreign policy concerns during his telephone call to Foreign Minister Kharrazi on 29 April which focused exclusively on the postponement of his visit to Iran in the light of the situation in Zimbabwe.

Wine Expenditure

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much his Department has spent on (a) champagne and (b) other wine in each year since 1 May 1997. [121781]

Mr. Hain: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office does not maintain a comprehensive central record of these categories of expenditure. A comprehensive breakdown of expenditure could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Macedonia

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assistance his Department has provided to the British soldier Richard Hudson currently detained in Skopje jail in Macedonia; and if he will make a statement. [121956]

Mr. Hain: At the time of his arrest Mr. Hudson was working as a civilian sub-contractor for KFOR. He is not a member of HM armed forces.

Our consular staff in Macedonia have visited Mr. Hudson regularly since his arrest and will continue to do so during his detention. They have pursued every complaint or rumour of maltreatment, and taken up his case at the highest levels in the Macedonian Government.

Mr. Hudson has made an application for a transfer to a UK prison under the Council of Europe Transfer of Prisoners Agreement. We have passed his application to the UK prison service and to the Minister of Justice in Macedonia. We will continue to press the Macedonian Government for a quick decision.

British Overseas Territories Bill

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 5 May 2000, Official Report, column 240W, when he expects to conclude his consideration of the principles to be addressed in the Overseas Territories Bill. [121841]

Mr. Battle: We hope to conclude consideration of the principles to be addressed in the Overseas Territories Bill by the end of May this year.

SOCIAL SECURITY

War Pensions

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many former service personnel who participated in the nuclear tests programmes in Australia and the South Pacific have been awarded war pensions after they developed (a) leukaemia, excluding chronic lymphatic and (b) multiple myeloma; when was the first time that former service personnel were awarded war pensions after developing these illnesses; and if he will make a statement. [121615]

Mr. Bayley: The administration of the War Pensions Agency is a matter for the Chief Executive of the War Pensions Agency, Mr. Gordon Hextall. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Gordon Hextall to Mrs. Ann Winterton, dated 12 May 2000:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking how many former service personnel who participated in the nuclear tests programmes in Australia and South Pacific have been awarded war pensions after they developed (a) leukaemia, excluding chronic lymphatic and (b) multiple myeloma; when was the first time that former service personnel were awarded war pensions after developing these illnesses; and if he will make a statement.

The War Pensions Agency processes claims for war disablement and war widows' pensions and for associated supplementary allowances. Under the war pensions scheme, awards may be made in respect of any condition which is due to any service in the armed forces.

We do collect statistics of all claims for war pensions from British nuclear test veterans who believe that they might have been exposed during service to excessive radiation. However, these also include claims from personnel who served, for example, on nuclear submarines.

The statistics at 10th May 2000 are as follows:

Leukaemia: 9 cases (5 disablement, 4 widows)

Multiple myeloma: 13 cases (10 disablement, 3 widows)

You will wish to know that the background to these awards is that as a result of concern amongst some test participants about the effects that the participation may have on their health, the Ministry of Defence commissioned an independent study by the National Radiological Protection Board (NRPB) in 1988 to investigate the subsequent health of participants. The study compared the mortality and cancer incidence in over 20,000 test participants with that of a similar-sized control group of ex-servicemen who had not participated in the test programme.

The 1988 NRPB Report and the Department's position

The NRPB Report published in 1988 confirmed that participation in the UK tests has not had a detectable effect on the participants' expectation of life, nor on their risk of developing cancer in general. It did, however, raise a reasonable doubt that leukaemia (other than chronic lymphatic leukaemia) and multiple myeloma might be due to participation. Whilst the NBPB Report did not causally relate leukaemia and multiple myeloma specifically to participation in the nuclear weapons tests, its' evidence was nevertheless accepted as raising a reasonable doubt that leukaemia (other than chronic lymphatic leukaemia) and multiple myeloma may have resulted from such participation. Thus, any claim for war pension in respect of disablement or death due to leukaemia (other than chronic lymphatic leukaemia) and multiple myeloma was likely to succeed. This policy was effective from 28th January 1988.

The 1993 NRPB Report

The study was extended and the second NRPB Report was issued in 1993. This confirmed the overall conclusion of the 1988 Report, that participation in the tests had no detectable effect on the participants' expectation of life, nor on their risk of developing most cancers. It concluded that the small hazard of multiple myeloma suggested by the 1988 Report was not supported by the additional data, although the possibility of some small risk of developing leukaemia (other than chronic lymphatic leukaemia) in the first 25 years after participation could not be ruled out.

As a result of this later Report, it is now the Secretary of State's normal policy to accept any new claim in respect of leukaemia (other than chronic lymphatic leukaemia) if the participant developed the condition within 25 years of his participation in the tests. This change was effective from 11th December 1993. War Pensions already in payment to test participants or their widows in respect of disablement or death due to leukaemia (other than chronic lymphatic leukaemia) or multiple myeloma were not affected by that decision.

Evidence of service-related ionising radiation exposure

Should there be reliable evidence of service-related ionising radiation and where there is a recognised link between the claimed condition and such exposure, an award of war pension will be considered.

The Secretary of State does not accept evidence of participation in the nuclear tests as itself equating to proof of service-related ionising radiation exposure.

If I can be of any further assistance, please do not hesitate to ask.

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many claims for war pensions by British nuclear test veterans have been (a) made and (b) awarded to date. [121303]

Mr. Bayley: The administration of the War Pensions Agency is a matter for the Chief Executive of the War Pensions Agency, Mr. Gordon Hextall. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Gordon Hextall to Mr. Andrew Welsh, dated 12 May 2000:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking how many claims for war pension by British nuclear test veterans have been (a) made and (b) awarded to date.

The War Pensions Agency processes claims for war disablement and war widows' pensions, and for associated supplementary allowances. Under the war pensions scheme awards may be made in respect of any condition which is due to any service in the armed forces. Unfortunately, our statistics do not specifically record the number of claims from, and awards to, ex-service personnel whose service included participation in the British nuclear test programme. To obtain that precise information would require a clerical exercise which could only be carried out at disproportionate costs.

However, we do have statistics of claims for war pension from British nuclear test veterans who believe that they might have been exposed during service to excessive ionising radiation, but these include claims from personnel who served, for example, in nuclear submarines.

At 31st March 2000, these statistics record 1,228 claims which resulted in 467 awards, but these are for a miscellany of conditions, some of which have no connection to participation in the test programme.

If I can be of any further assistance, then please do not hesitate to contact me.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Maritime Safety

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the conclusions reached at the Council of Ministers meeting of 28 March on maritime safety; what measures are under discussion involving co-operation with (a) defence ministers and (b) European defence agencies for future presentation to a European Council meeting concerning a global strategy by the European Union in the Field of Maritime Security; and what is his policy thereon. [119815]

Mr. Hill: I have been asked to reply.

In answer to the first part of his question on maritime safety I refer the hon. Member to my reply given on 30 March 2000, Official Report, columns 230–31W. In answer to the second part, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence has not had any discussions concerning a global strategy by the European Union in the field of maritime security.

Export Licences

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on what date his Department received export licence application number 8664; on what date he expects it to be determined; and if he will make a statement about its progress. [122037]

Dr. Howells: Licence Application 8664 was received by the Export Control Organisation (ECO) on 15 December 1999. The application is currently under consideration in conjunction with other Government Departments. A decision on the licence application will be reached as quickly as possible consistent with the need to give full consideration to the issues involved.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proposals he has to ensure that applications for export licences are published in advance, allowing for proper public and parliamentary debate before decisions are made. [121717]

Dr. Howells: The 1998 White Paper on Strategic Export Controls proposed that new primary legislation should provide for parliamentary scrutiny of secondary export control legislation, but the White Paper stated that the Government did not consider there should be advance parliamentary scrutiny of individual export licence applications as this would slow down significantly the process of decision making and raise difficult issues of commercial confidentiality. The Foreign Affairs and Trade and Industry Committees endorsed this conclusion while the Quadripartite Committee on Strategic Export Controls has stated that it will seek to come to conclusions on this issue in its next Report.

All the White Paper proposals are under review in the light of comments received. In coming to conclusions on this issue, the Government will take account also of the conclusions of the Committees, including any conclusions reached by the Quadripartite Committee on this matter. We will be announcing proposals for new export control legislation following conclusion of the review.

Small Firms

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what research his Department has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated on the way that assistance is given to small firms in the regions. [121662]

Ms Hewitt: The DTI is responsible for many forms of assistance to small firms. All those services are subject to regular evaluation.

At a regional level, business support can be provided in a variety of ways. Some services are provided by the Government Offices in the regions; others are provided by the Regional Development Agencies. But the most important mechanism for providing support for small businesses at the local level in England is the network of Business Link partnerships. These provide their own services, but also access to other forms of support from both the public and private sector. Funding mechanisms also vary and, in relevant areas, EU funding can be a significant source of business support.

It is critically important that the services provided and funded by Government are effective both in terms of content and delivery. The Department therefore asked each Regional Development Agency (and the London Development Partnership) last year to report on the delivery of business support in their region. A number of RDAs supported their reviews with external research. Those reports are now being received and the newly-established Small Business Service will be taking forward the reports with each of the RDAs. In parallel, the Small Business Service is itself restructuring the Business Link network, with the aim of new Business Link partnerships coming into operation from April 2001. The new partnerships will be expected to develop their services within the context both of the RDA regional economic strategies and national priorities established by the SBS.

Enterprise Fund

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the small firms who will directly benefit from the Government's Enterprise Fund (a) nationally and (b) in the Crosby constituency. [121660]

Ms Hewitt: The main elements of the Enterprise Fund are the Small Firms Loan Guarantee Scheme, the UK High Technology Fund and the Regional Venture Capital Funds.

With regard to the Small Firms Loan Guarantee Scheme, the Government act as guarantor to the lenders in the scheme. The loan is arranged between the lender and the small firm and is subject to commercial confidentiality procedures.

Both venture capital elements of the Enterprise Fund, namely the UK High Technology Fund and Regional Venture Capital Funds are currently being developed. They will be managed by professional fund managers. All their investment decisions will be made on a commercial basis. As an investor in the funds, the Government will not be able to forecast which small businesses will directly benefit.

It is therefore not possible to list, either nationally or for the Crosby constituency, which small firms will directly benefit from the Government's Enterprise Fund.

Partnership Fund

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how the Partnership Fund will achieve its aims of fostering new attitudes and approaches to partnership at work; and how much money is to be made available for the Fund. [121663]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The Fund supports projects to develop partnership approaches in the workplace and to disseminate best practice. Up to £5 million is being made available in a series of calls over four years.

Thirty-five projects, having a total value of £2,880,000, are being supported under the first call for proposals of the Partnership Fund. The second call for proposals was launched by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on 9 May 2000 and the deadline for applications is 21 July 2000.

Shipbuilding

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will ensure that Shipbuilding Intervention Fund money will remain available to UK shipbuilders for the remainder of this year. [121470]

Mr. Alan Johnson: I announced on 25 January 2000, Official Report, column 199W that I had decided to extend the availability of the Shipbuilding Intervention Fund to 31 December 2000. I am pleased to confirm that that remains the position.

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on (a) perceptions of the effectiveness of the home shipbuilding credit guarantee scheme and (b) the plans the Government have to alter the scheme. [121469]

Mr. Alan Johnson: I believe that the scheme has played an important role in helping UK yards win new orders since its inception in the 1960s, and continues to do so. The scheme has supported some 1,200 vessels to the value of more than £4.5 billion. It currently supports UK built ships to the tune of £200 million.

The Department runs the scheme on a comparable basis to similar schemes in our main competitor countries and we believe that its current terms/facilities are competitive. To this end, and in response to recommendations from our partnership with the industry in the Shipbuilding Forum in 1999, we delivered significant improvements to the scheme by making loans available in euros and US dollars, and by making guarantees only facilities available too. This makes the scheme one of the few to offer guarantees only, and to offer finance of up to 12 years.

Following the introduction of these improvements, there is now a high level of inquiry for finance under the scheme involving potential orders for eligible ships at virtually all the UK yards.

In line with our general approach we remain ready to consider constructive suggestions for ways that the scheme might be strengthened in the future.

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on his Department's support for shipbuilding (a) on the River Clyde and (b) in the United Kingdom as a whole. [121315]

Mr. Alan Johnson: My Department's strategy is to support and promote all parts of the UK shipbuilding industry equally, irrespective of their location. In particular, the policy is to assist the industry to improve its competitiveness. In July 1998 my Department established the Shipbuilding Forum whose membership comprises representatives of the shipbuilding and ship repair industry, trades unions, equipment suppliers and customers, both private and public sector. Also involved are the National Training Organisation for the marine sector and relevant Government Departments. The Forum's terms of reference are to consider the current situation of the shipbuilding and ship repair industry and how to improve its competitiveness so as to increase its share of the European market, leading to increased output, profitability and employment.

Energy Supplies

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to penalise gas and electricity companies that take over control of peoples' energy supplies without their consent. [121445]

Mrs. Liddell: The Government take seriously the distress and inconvenience caused by involuntary transfers and has encouraged Ofgem to take firm action with the companies concerned.

It is for the Director General of Gas and Electricity Supply to determine what action should be taken to combat involuntary transfers of energy supply. The Office of Gas and Electricity Markets [Ofgem] is taking steps that will significantly reduce these transfers. Among other things, Ofgem recently renewed the licence condition for gas and electricity suppliers governing sales and marketing practices, and is presently consulting on further enhancements. Ofgem also works closely with individual suppliers to resolve problems that lead to customer complaints.

Radio Frequencies (Mobile Phones)

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what consultations Her Majesty's Government have had with the authorities responsible for airport radar systems in respect of the distribution of new frequencies for mobile phones. [121360]

Ms Hewitt: None of the radio frequencies for the licences assigned by the recent third generation mobile communications auction is used by airport radar systems.

A proposal to share frequency bands, including those used by civil airport radar in the UK, for possible future expansion of third generation mobile systems, is to be discussed at the World Radio Conference currently taking place in Istanbul (WRC-2000). The authorities concerned with civil airport radar were fully involved in the UK's preparations for WRC-2000, and ensured that the requirements of safety were taken into account. The agreed European position is that further study is required before any decisions can be taken.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when new licences for mobile phones will be issued; and what effect the distribution of frequencies will have on the optimal use of the spectrum. [121362]

Ms Hewitt: Subject to the provisions of the Wireless Telegraphy (Third Generation Licences) Notice 1999, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry will grant a Wireless Telegraphy Act Licence for Third Generation Mobile Communications within 20 business days of the successful bidder for the licence confirming either that it is not subject to any preconditions or that it is no longer subject to any preconditions. Licences were issued to TIW UMTS UK Ltd. and One 2 One Personal Communications Ltd. on 9 May 2000.

A well designed auction with well informed bidders should ensure that spectrum licences go to those who place the highest value on them and are most likely to make optimal use of the spectrum. In addition, the issue of five licences, including one reserved for a new entrant, should help to ensure that the available spectrum is used effectively by increasing sustainable competition and encouraging the faster roll-out of innovative services.

Rover

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will send copies of the interim report from the Rover Task Force to hon. Members with West Midlands constituencies; and if he will place a copy in the Library. [121134]

Mr. Alan Johnson [holding answer 8 May 2000]: May I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden) on 5 May 2000, Official Report, column 231W.

Radio Spectrum

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to receive the money from the sale of the radio spectrum; and if he will make a statement. [121198]

Ms Hewitt: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry expects to receive all of the receipts from the auction of Wireless Telegraph Act licences for Third Generation mobile communications in the current financial year.

Motor Industry

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many businesses there are which conduct retail, after sales and repair of motor vehicles in the United Kingdom; and how many of them employ fewer than 50 people. [121590]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 11 May 2000]: In 1999, there were 60,455 businesses in these sectors. 8,435 employed fewer than 50.

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the motor retail franchised dealers (a) he and (b) his officials have visited in the United Kingdom since July 1999. [121595]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 11 May 2000]: My officials are in regular contact with the Retail Motor Industry Federation (RMIF) which also includes the National Franchise Dealers Association.

I met with John Edwards of the Phoenix Consortium, a Rover dealer and a member of the RMIF during the recent contacts over Rover.

Arms Exports

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what recent representations he has received on the controls on licensed production and brokerage of arms for export; and if he will make a statement; [121732]

(2) what initiatives he is pursuing for greater control of licensed production and brokerage of arms for export; and if he will make a statement. [121731]

Dr. Howells: The 1998 White Paper on Strategic Export Controls (Cm 3989) contained proposals to extend controls on trafficking and brokering in several areas, including in respect of the supply of arms and other controlled goods to any country subject to embargo and the supply of equipment the export from the UK of which has been banned because of evidence that goods of the same type have been used in torture. All the White Paper proposals are currently under review in the light of comments received.

As part of this review the Government are also considering the issue of licensed production overseas following the raising of this issue in a number of the responses to the White Paper. However, a licence is already required for the export of any controlled equipment or technology in tangible form needed for an overseas manufacturing facility.

In recent months the Department for Trade and Industry has received representations on the issues of arms brokering and licensed production from Oxfam and Amnesty International's UK Directors, from many individual members of these two organisations and from other members of the public.

The Government will announce proposals for new export control legislation following conclusion of the current review of the White Paper proposals.

Penalty Clause

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the contracts entered into with private sector companies for the provision of goods or services since May 1997 where penalty clauses were triggered for non-performance; and if he will make a statement. [122015]

Dr. Howells: Where appropriate, DTI contracts include liquidated damages clauses. Penalty clauses are not legally enforceable. The DTI has a great number of contracts in operation at any one time, the details of which are not held centrally. It would entail disproportionate cost to find out which of these contracts included liquidated damages clauses and which of those clauses had been invoked.

Contracting Out

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the areas within his Department and its agencies where functions have been contracted out, listing (a) the cost involved, (b) date of contract with expiry term, (c) the name of the company and (d) the area within the DTI from which the functions have been taken since May 1997. [121619]

Dr. Howells: I will arrange to write to the hon. Member with this information shortly.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Influenza

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee which anti-viral drugs are available to hon. Members and staff at the Palace of Westminster to treat influenza. [121972]

Mrs. Roe: Stocks of a number of common drugs for emergency use are kept in the occupational health consulting room off the Lower Waiting Hall. These include drugs for treating angina, asthma and bacterial infections. These can be issued by the occupational health doctors, and by certain medically qualified hon. Members. The occupational health service also provides influenza vaccinations for hon. Members and staff in the at-risk groups.

The service does not, however, hold other drugs (including anti-viral influenza drugs) as the House's medical services are not intended to replace normal GP services.

Surveillance Devices

Mr. Baker: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission, how many surveillance devices are in use (a) inside and (b) outside buildings on the Parliamentary Estate; what is the (i) nature, (ii) location, (iii) purpose and (iv) cost of installing and running each such device; and if he will make a statement. [120773]

Mr. Kirkwood [holding answer 11 May 2000]: The outturn for expenditure on security services in 1998–99 for the House of Commons was £13,953,000 as shown in the commission's Twenty-First Annual Report for 1998–99 (HC721); in 1999–2000 the cost was £13,454,174.

It is not the practice to give detailed information of the type asked for by my hon. Friend.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Remploy Ltd.

Mr. Anthony D. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the findings of the first stage of the quinquennial review of Remploy Ltd. [122343]

Ms Hodge: The Department has now completed the prior options stage of the quinquennial review of Remploy. Copies of the report have been placed in the Library and will be sent to those who contributed to the consultation exercise. The report is also available on the DfEE website (www.dfee.gov.uk).

The review considered a number of options but decided that Remploy's position and NDPB status should remain as it is for now. The next stage of this review will start shortly and will be completed within three months. During this stage the review team will look at the relationship between the Government and the Company to ensure that it operates to the highest standards in line with the commitment set out in the Modernising Government White Paper.

There will be a further review in two years time to assess the impact of Remploy's new Corporate Plan—Remploy 21.

Correspondence

Mr. McLoughlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he will reply to the letter dated 30 March from the hon. Member for West Derbyshire in relation to the Chairman of the Governors of the Fitzherbert School in Fenny Bentley, Derbyshire. [121450]

Mr. Wills: A reply to the hon. Member was issued on Wednesday 10 May 2000.

Mr. McLoughlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when the hon. Member for West Derbyshire will receive a reply to his letter of 30 March about the William Gilbert School in Duffield, Derbyshire. [121441]

Mr. Wills: A reply to the hon. Member's letter was issued on 8 May 2000.

New Deal

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many (a) men and (b) women from ethnic minority communities living in the Greater London area have benefited from the New Deal. [121122]

Ms Jowell: New Deal actively promotes equality of opportunity and outcome for people of all ethnic and racial groups. Targets have been set for all Units of Delivery to achieve parity of outcome on jobs between white and ethnic minority young people, by the end of this Parliament. Latest figures show that to the end of February 2000, in Greater London, 19,157 men and 10,035 women from ethnic minority groups have benefited from starting the New Deal for young people and that 12,198 men and 2,565 women from ethnic minority groups have benefited from starting the national New Deal for long-term unemployed people aged 25 or over. Many others will have benefited from the New Deal for Lone Parents and other New Deals.

Free School Meals

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many children living in the Greater London area were receiving free school meals on 1 April. [121973]

Ms Estelle Morris: The data are not available in the form requested. Figures on the number of day pupils attending maintained schools[1] in the Greater London Government Office Region who took a free meal in January this year is currently being collected. Latest estimates show that there were 226,000 such pupils, which represents 21 per cent. of the pupil population.

Final national figures will be published in the Statistical Volume "Statistics of Education: Schools in England 2000" in September, a copy of which will be available in the Library.

[1] Includes pupils of all ages attending maintained nursery, primary and secondary schools, pupil referral units and all special schools in the Greater London Government Office Region.

Primary and Secondary Schools (Gloucestershire)

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much was spent per pupil in (a) Gloucestershire and (b) England and Wales, in (i) primary schools and (ii) secondary schools in each of the last ten years for which figures are available. [122005]

Ms Estelle Morris: The following table sets out spending per pupil in Gloucestershire and England, from 1990–91 to 1998–99, the latest year for which expenditure figures are available. The figures are based on Net Institutional Expenditure.

Higher Education (Standardised Testing)

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to encourage higher education institutions to introduce standardised testing for scholastic attainment. [119143]

Mr. Wicks [holding answer 17 April 2000]: Admissions procedures are a matter in the first instance for individual higher education institutions.

The Government wish to see a widening of access to higher education, and we share the aspiration of those who promote the use of Scholastic Aptitude Tests (SATs) that higher education should be available to all who can benefit from it. The substantial reform of post-16 qualifications to be introduced from September will help broaden access to university by giving recognition to a wider range of qualifications. In addition, we are investing heavily in raising standards in deprived areas through "Excellence in Cities". This year we shall be launching new summer schools to help young people to understand better the opportunities higher education can offer. New "Opportunity Bursaries" of up to £1,000 per year will also be introduced from next year to give able young people from areas without a history of participation in higher education the extra financial incentives and confidence they need to embark on a higher education course.

The Sutton Trust is running a small pilot of SAT-type tests in schools in England this year.

Although its research is entirely separate from DfEE activities in this area we are happy to work closely with the Trust because its work is focused on widening the socio-economic profile of students in higher education. We have learned from its experience in running summer schools and have adopted much of its best practice in the summer schools we will launch this summer.

Education Funding (Somerset)

Mr. Ashdown: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what is the average per pupil education standard spending assessment for 2000–01 in (a) primary and (b) secondary schools in (i) England and (ii) Somerset; what is the reason for the difference between (i) and (ii); and if he will make a statement; [121235]

(2) if he will estimate the additional cash which would be available for education in Somerset if the average per pupil standard spending assessment for primary and secondary schools in Somerset was the same as the average for England; and if he will make a statement. [121221]

Ms Estelle Morris [holding answer 10 May 2000]: The following table shows for 2000–01 education SSA per primary and secondary pupil for Somerset and England.

SSA	Somerset	England	Difference
Primary per pupil	2,310	2,474	164
Secondary per pupil	2,984	3,175	191

The differences between the figures for England and those for Somerset are a result of the authority receiving a below average share of the national total for education standard spending to reflect social deprivation and area costs. If Somerset's SSA per pupil for primary and secondary schools were the same as the national average it is estimated that its education SSA would be £11 million higher. Since 1997–98 Somerset's education SSA per pupil has increased by £338, and its special and specific grants per pupil have increased by £193.

Somerset will benefit this year from Standards Fund grant of £8.8 million. Its share of the £50 million and £290 million special grants will be £3 million.

Merlin Operators

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many Merlin operators have been accepted into service; [121606]

(2) how many further deliveries of Merlin operators are anticipated during the next (a) six months, (b) 12 months, (c) 18 months and (d) 24 months. [121607]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 11 May 2000]: There are two Merlin programmes, namely the Merlin Mk1 Anti-Submarine Warfare Helicopter and the Merlin Mk3 Support Helicopter.

To date 12 Merlin Mk1s have been accepted into service, but no Mk3s.

The following further Merlin deliveries into service are anticipated in the periods in the question (figures are shown cumulatively):

(a) Five Mk1 and seven Mk3 within six months;

(b) 12 Mk1 and 11 Mk3 within 12 months;

(c) 18 Mk1 and 16 Mk3 within 18 months;

(d) 29 Mk1 and 22 Mk3 within 24 months.

Lynx Helicopters

Mr. DuncanSmith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many of the Lynx helicopters that have been grounded due to serious technical faults will be back in service within (a) six months, (b) 12 months, (c) 18 months and (d) 24 months. [121602]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 11 May 2000]: A number of steps are already being taken to increase the number of main rotor heads available for our Lynx helicopters, including bringing forward heads unaffected by fatigue problems from other airframes in routine maintenance, and improving repair and overhaul times. These will generate a steady improvement in Lynx availability with full fleet recovery being achieved after the delivery of new rotor heads in 18 months to two years. There are sufficient Lynx helicopters already available to meet all primary operational tasks.

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many of the remaining Lynx helicopters have been converted to Mark 8 standard. [121600]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 11 May 2000]: 31 Mark 3 Lynx helicopters have been converted to Mark 8 standard, six are currently undergoing conversion at the Defence Aviation Repair Agency. We are currently examining whether to convert the final 12 Mark 3s as originally planned in light of the remaining fatigue life of the aircraft.

Fisher Patrol Squadron

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to order a new class of ships for the Fisher Patrol Squadron. [121609]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 11 May 2000]: The Department's agreement with the Ministry for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food for the provision of Fishery Protection services is kept under periodic review. As part of the normal planning process, the ordering of replacements for those vessels currently used in the Fishery Protection role will be considered as the vessels reach the end of their lives.

Frigates and Minehunters

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the cost per annum is of operating (a) Type 23 frigates, (b) Type 22 frigates, (c) SSNs, (d) Hunt Class minehunters and (e) Sandown Class minehunters. [121608]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 11 May 2000]: The actual cost per annum of operation (a) Type 23 frigates, (b) Type 22 frigates, (c) SSNs, (d) Hunt Class minehunters and (e) Sandown Class minehunters will vary considerably dependent on the tasking/maintenance undertaken. Indicative annual costs, including manpower, fuel and stores only, would be in the region of £16 million for a Type 23 and a Type 22 frigate, £11 million for an SSN, £3 million for a Hunt Class minehunter and £2 million for a Sandown Class minehunter.

Aircraft Information Systems

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what the target dates for the completion of the information systems for Sea Kings are; and if they will be met; [121604]

(2) what the target dates for the completion of the information systems for Sea Harriers are; and if they will be met. [121605]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 11 May 2000]: The Mission System Upgrade for the Sea King Airborne Early Warning helicopters includes the installation of the Joint Tactical Information Distribution System (JTIDS). This programme is on target to meet the predicted in service date of late 2001.

It is expected that all Sea Harriers FA2 aircraft will be equipped with JTIDs by 2005 as planned.

Cluster Bombs

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the targets against which cluster bombs were deployed by the Royal Air Force during Operation Allied Force were selected by (a) Her Majesty's Government and (b) by NATO multilateral targeting arrangements. [121668]

Mr. Spellar: During Operation Allied Force, Royal Air Force Harrier GR7s released cluster weapons (RBL755s) against fixed targets and Yugoslav/Serbian fielded forces. The selection and allocation of fixed targets, and the nomination of aircraft to specific tasks, was the responsibility of NATO's Combined Air Operations Centre at Vicenza in Italy. This selection and tasking process was conducted in close coordination with the UK's air commander in theatre who scrutinised all targets and tasks against national Rules of Engagement and targeting constraints, where appropriate consulting the UK national chain of command.

On the other hand, attacks against fielded forces were normally conducted in response to targets which had been located, identified and allocated by an Airborne Forward Air Control aircraft. In these highly responsive circumstances, the Harrier GR7 pilot was responsible for locating, positively identifying and assessing the validity of the target against clearly defined Rules of Engagement; the pilot was also responsible for selecting the most appropriate number and type of weapon to be released. UK armed forces will always use the weapons judged most appropriate against a given target, taking into account weapon effectiveness and the need to minimise collateral damage.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many BL755 cluster bombs were used in the Falklands Islands by Her Majesty's Armed Forces; how many submunitions from these weapons have been cleared; and what estimates have been made of the number of submunitions remaining. [121667]

Mr. Spellar: I will write to my hon. Friend and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

RAF Fylingdales

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans there are for the use of RAF Fylingdales for the National Missile Defense system. [121998]

Mr. Hoon: We have not received a request from the US regarding the use of RAF Fylingdales as part of the NMD system, and nor would we expect any until after a US decision on whether or not to proceed towards deployment of such a system.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many American (a) civilian and (b) military personnel are based at RAF Fylingdales. [121999]

Mr. Spellar: There are nine US civilian contractor employees and one US military officer at RAF Fylingdales.

RAF Feltwell

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the operational purpose of RAF Feltwell; and how many (a) UK and (b) US personnel are stationed there. [121997]

Mr. Spellar: RAF Feltwell is a passive deep space tracking station and part of a worldwide network of sensors tracking man-made objects in deep space. As at 10 May 2000, there were 124 US personnel stationed there in support of this role, and no UK personnel. Feltwell also provides a support function for RAF Lakenheath.

Menwith Hill

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many (a) US military, (b) US civilian, (c) UK military and (d) UK civilian personnel work at Menwith Hill Station. [121780]

Mr. Spellar: As at 26 April 2000, at RAF Menwith Hill there were 415 US military, 989 US civilian, five UK military and 392 UK civilian personnel (excluding GCHQ staff). I am withholding the numbers of GCHQ staff under exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the planned numbers of US military personnel at Menwith Hill Station will be in (a) 2000, (b) 2003 and (c) 2005. [121783]

Mr. Spellar: As at 26 April 2000, there were 415 US military personnel at RAF Menwith Hill. This number is not expected to change significantly in the foreseeable future.

Joint Operations

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what joint operations or exercises have taken place outside the United Kingdom since 1 March 1999 between British forces and members of the armed forces of states that are not parties to the Ottawa Convention. [122033]

Mr. Spellar: Since 1 March 1999, UK forces have participated in 10 joint operations and 13 joint exercises outside of the UK with armed forces from states that are not parties to the Ottawa Convention. These states are: Azerbaijan, Bahrain, China, Egypt, Estonia, Finland, Georgia, India, Kuwait, Kyrgyztan, Latvia, Libya, Morocco, Nepal, Nigeria, Oman, Pakistan, Republic of Korea, Russia, Saudi Arabia, Singapore, Sri Lanka, Turkey, UAE and USA.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Sheep Dip

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 17 April 2000, Official Report, columns 333–34W, (1) what proportion of the sum attributed to the introduction of a single charge for authorisation for the disposal of used sheep dip will accrue to (a) sheep farmers, (b) other farmers and (c) non-farmers; [120638]

(2) which years the four-year period for the introduction of a single charge for the disposal of sheep dip applies to. [120637]

Mr. Mullin [holding answer 3 May 2000]: I have been asked to reply.

The single charge shall apply to the first four years of an initial groundwater authorisation falling in the Environment Agency's "Reduced Application Charge" band, whenever such an authorisation might commence. The Environment Agency's existing records show that some 73 per cent. of the sum attributed to the introduction of this single charge will accrue to sheep farmers, 26 per cent. to other farmers, and 1 per cent. to non-farmers.

TREASURY

Mobile Phone Licences

Dr. Cable: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much of the receipts from the auction of Third Generation mobile phone licences is in the form of an initial payment in the current financial year. [121028]

Ms Hewitt: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry expects to receive all of the receipts from the auction of Wireless Telegraphy Act licences for Third Generation mobile communications in the current financial year.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Landmines Act

Mr. Hope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what responsibility his Department has in respect of the Landmines Act 1998. [122344]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Following discussions between the Departments concerned, the reply given by my right hon. Friend, the Minister of State, Home Office, (Mr. Boateng), on 20 May 1999, Official Report, column 443W, requires expansion. The Home Secretary has general ministerial responsibility for enforcement action under the Landmines Act 1998 taken by the police in England and Wales, with parallel responsibilities being exercised in Northern Ireland by the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland and in Scotland by the Scottish Ministers. Her Majesty's Customs and Excise also have enforcement responsibilities under the Act. In addition, the Foreign Secretary has responsibility for policy on the Ottawa Convention and for co-ordinating any amendments to the Landmines Act which may arise from amendments to the Ottawa Convention. Action may be taken under other provisions of the Act by the Secretaries of State for the Department for International Development, the Ministry of Defence, the Department for Trade and Industry, the Attorney-General and the Attorney-General for Northern Ireland.

Immigration

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons married to United Kingdom citizens have been (a) served with deportation orders and (b) deported from the United Kingdom in each of the last 10 years. [121742]

Mrs. Roche: The central deportation records do not separately identify spouses of United Kingdom citizens and the information requested could, therefore, be obtained only at disproportionate cost through the examination of individual case files.

Youth Custody Orders

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many youth custody orders have been used since their introduction; and how many are in use. [121786]

Mr. Boateng: The detention and training order under the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 was implemented on 1 April 2000. It is the new main custodial sentence for juveniles aged 12 to 17 and replaced the secure training order and detention in a young offender institution for that age group. Because the minimum term of a detention and training order is four months, all the orders which have been made since 1 April remain in force. Information from the Youth Justice Board for England and Wales indicates that on 10 May, 483 detention and training orders were being served.

Asylum Seekers

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many asylum seekers have been granted exceptional leave to remain in the United Kingdom under the backlog clearance exercise; and if he will make a statement. [122027]

Mrs. Roche: Since the start of the backlog clearance exercise in late December 1998 up to the end of March 2000, 15,125 initial decisions were made to grant exceptional leave to remain under the backlog criteria set out in the White Paper. We are aiming to clear the backlog of pre-1996 asylum applications by the end of July this year.

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the implementation of the voucher scheme for asylum seekers; what has been the impact on administrative costs of the scheme; and if he will make a statement. [121992]

Mrs. Roche: The National Asylum Support Service commenced the distribution of vouchers on 3 April 2000. From this date, destitute asylum seekers and their dependants have been able to exchange vouchers for cash at designated Post Offices and for goods in over 18,000 affiliated national and independent retail outlets.

As the new voucher scheme has only been in operation since 3 April it is too early to make any meaningful assessment of its impact on central and local government administration costs.

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will bring the new support arrangements for asylum seekers into force for all new asylum applicants. [121995]

Mrs. Roche: The new support arrangements were introduced on 3 April for those seeking asylum at port and extended on 17 April to bring onto the scheme new in-country applicants who make an asylum claim in Kent and those asylum seekers resident in Kent who receive a first decision on their application and then go on to appeal. It is hoped to bring all new asylum applicants onto the new support arrangements within six months.

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of asylum seekers were recognised as refugees in the last six months; and if he will make a statement. [121994]

Mrs. Roche: In the period October 1999 to March 2000, of the initial decisions made under normal procedures on applications for asylum to the United Kingdom 7 per cent. were granted refugee status. In addition, 3 per cent. of applications received in the period July 1993 to December 1995 which were decided in the latest six months under the backlog criteria set out in the White Paper were granted refugee status.

Information on asylum can be accessed via the Internet at http://www.homeoffice.gov.uk/rds/index.htm.

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what provisions govern the legality of selling and buying vouchers issued to asylum seekers under the new support arrangements; what is the maximum penalty; how many persons have been convicted of an offence and what sentences they received; if the vouchers are marked 'non-transferable'; and if he will make a statement. [122000]

Mrs. Roche: There are no specific provisions in the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999 directly covering the sale or purchase of vouchers issued to asylum seekers under the new support arrangements. However, it is made clear on the face of a voucher that it is only for the use of the person named on it. Accordingly, any attempt to obtain cash or goods by a person other than the one named on the voucher could constitute an offence under the Theft Acts or conspiracy to defraud at common law, for which there is a range of maximum sentences. In certain circumstances, the offences of making false or dishonest representations (the maximum penalty for which is seven years imprisonment on conviction on indictment), under Part VI of the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999, may be made out. These latter offences correspond to anti-fraud provisions in social security legislation.

No persons have been convicted of an offence relating to the sale or purchase or other misuse of vouchers provided under the new arrangements.

Any asylum seeker who disposes of their vouchers for cash might be liable to be charged with conspiracy to commit or aiding and abetting the commission of the offences under the Theft Acts or the 1999 Act.

Any asylum seeker receiving support under the national asylum support scheme who obtains cash from whatever source or by whatever means and fails to notify the National Asylum Support Service (NASS) would be liable to have their support suspended or discontinued under regulation 20(1)(a) of the Asylum Support Regulations 2000, as he would be in breach of a condition subject to which the asylum support had been provided (notification of change of circumstances). If they fail to notify the Service dishonestly and with a view to obtaining an advantage for themselves or another, they commit an offence under the 1999 Act which is punishable with a maximum of seven years imprisonment.

The NASS is presently in the process of establishing its intelligence and investigation functions. It is intended that NASS be able to receive complaints of fraud or misuse of its voucher scheme, to investigate these as appropriate, and to take such action as may seem correct in the individual case.

Child Curfew Orders

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many local child curfew orders have been issued; and if he will make a statement. [121985]

Mr. Boateng: No applications have been received from local authorities to establish child curfew schemes under section 14 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998. Following consultation with local authorities and the police, the Government are considering what improvements might be made to the provisions to ensure that they are able to contribute effectively to local partnership efforts to tackle anti-social behaviour.

Global Cultural Diversity Congress

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what timetable has been set for the review of the cancellation of the Global Cultural Diversity Congress announced on 22 February; if the review is under way; and if he will make a statement. [121991]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The review is underway and Mr. Gurbux Singh hopes to report to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, within a month.

Afghan Airliner Asylum Seekers

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of the persons who arrived in the United Kingdom on the hijacked Afghan airliner (a) have claimed asylum, (b) have been granted refugee status including as dependants, (c) have been granted exceptional leave to remain, (d) have had their claims refused, (e) have appealed against a refusal of their claim, (f) have remained in the United Kingdom, (g) have been removed to Afghanistan and (h) have been removed to a third country; and if he will make a statement. [121990]

Mr. Straw: Of those persons who arrived on the hijacked Afghan airliner 79 have claimed asylum; eight passengers and six dependants have been granted asylum but no-one has been granted exceptional leave to remain; 37 have been refused asylum, of which five are dependants; all those who were refused have appealed; none have remained in this country without permission; and no-one has yet been removed to Afghanistan or to another third country. However, 81 of those on the aeroplane have now left this country voluntarily. Twelve individuals are the subject of criminal charges in relation to the hijacking.

Consideration of further action will be given as soon as the outcome of the outstanding appeals is known.

Anti-Social Behaviour Orders

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many anti-social behaviour orders have been issued against (a) persons (i) over and (ii) under the age of 18 and (b) persons under the age of 16; and if he will make a statement. [122028]

Mr. Straw: As hon. Friend the Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Clarke), stated in his reply to the hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins) on 21 February 2000, Official Report, column 824W, records of the numbers of anti-social behaviour orders issued are not currently held centrally. We understand that about 40 to 45 orders have been made in England and Wales since the relevant provisions of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 came into force in April last year. We understand that at least 21 were in respect of persons under the age of 18, of which at least 14 were in respect of persons aged under 16.

Crime Fighting Fund

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to announce the revised allocation of recruits under the Crime Fighting Fund; what discussions and meetings he has had with police authorities and chief constables about the revised allocation; what representations he has received on this issue; when he first informed police authorities and chief constables that the allocation would be revised to allow the recruitment of 5,000 extra recruits over two years rather than three; and if he will make a statement. [121988]

Mr. Straw: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply I gave her on 6 April 2000, Official Report, columns 595–96W.

My officials have consulted police service and police authority representatives on how the recruitment scheme can be accelerated. I have received some representations from hon. Members, chief constables and police authorities about their allocations under the Crime Fighting Fund recruitment scheme. I announced details of the accelerated scheme in a reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South (Mr. Cunningham) on 27 March 2000, Official Report, columns 1–3W, and I hope to make the promised further announcement shortly.

Recorded Crime

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the change in the level of recorded crime in (a) England and Wales and (b) each police force area in the year ending 31 March; and if he will make a statement. [121983]

Mr. Boateng: The Statistical Bulletin giving the Recorded Crime Statistics for the year ending 31 March 2000, including the requested details, is due to be published in July.

Institutional Racism

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the extent to which (a) his Department and (b) other Government Departments, non-departmental public bodies and executive agencies are institutionally racist; what criteria he uses to define institutional racism; and if he will make a statement. [121996]

Mr. Straw: I accepted the definition of institutional racism set out in the Stephen Lawrence Inquiry report as a useful guide in tackling discrimination and inequality within public services.

In the Home Office, we had already identified, through a staff survey, that a significant number of our minority ethnic staff felt that they had experienced prejudice or been denied opportunity. A programme of action was started including targets for recruitment, retention and progression, and the establishment of a minority ethnic network for staff.

The Government are determined that the public sector should lead on race equality. The legislation currently going through Parliament extends direct discrimination provisions to public authorities and includes, for the first time, indirect discrimination and a duty on all public authorities to promote race equality, and will prove a key lever in tackling institutional racism.

The Home Office is working with other Government Departments in developing strategies to inculcate race equality as a core issue. Responsibility for action by individual Departments or organisations rests with them.

Passport Fees

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to increase passport fees to cover the increased cost due to handling charges payable on credit card transactions as payment for passports. [121984]

Mrs. Roche: Savings resulting from the introduction of credit card payment for postal passport applications are likely to offset the costs of handling charges. Therefore, this development is unlikely to result in an increase in passport fees. The savings will result from more efficient processing of passport fee receipts. The facility to pay by credit card will also be more convenient for many passport customers than existing payment methods.

Passport Agency

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to improve the external communications and media handling capabilities of the United Kingdom Passport Agency; and if he will make a statement. [122034]

Mrs. Roche: The United Kingdom Passport Agency has undertaken a thorough audit of its external communications and media handling and has already introduced a number of improvements.

The Agency is undertaking more focused market research, to test new services and determine customer needs.

A 24 hour a day, seven days a week national telephone inquiry line has been established for general inquiries and for customers to check on progress of passport applications, as well as a same-day e-mail inquiry service, faxback service and a regularly updated website.

Passport offices have longer opening hours. The London office now opens at 7.30am Monday to Friday, all offices are open to 6pm, and Saturday opening will start this summer at all offices.

There are stronger links with the travel trade, to get important messages over to their customers.

The Agency is establishing a small team, dedicated to improving communications between the United Kingdom Passport Agency, its customers and the public, and to ensure that the Agency can respond more effectively to the media. The Agency is creating its own press office.

Referendum Campaigns

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what his policy is on Government activity during referendum campaigns. [121993]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Government have maintained, and will maintain, the usual rules on the activities of civil servants during referendum and election periods. In addition, the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Bill would prohibit the Government from publishing, displaying or distributing material in relation to a referendum in the 28 days immediately prior to the date of the poll. This proposal responds to the report of the Neill Committee and has been welcomed by the Committee.

Home Detention Curfew

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 8 May 2000, Official Report, column 312W, what period was served by the prisoner convicted of wounding (inflicting grievous bodily harm) and released on the Home Detention Curfew scheme before the end of the requisite period due to an error in sentence calculation (a) before release on the Home Detention Curfew scheme and (b) subsequently; and if he will make a statement. [122030]

Mr. Boateng: The prisoner convicted of wounding (inflicting grievous bodily harm) and released on the Home Detention Curfew scheme before the end of the requisite period served 215 days before his release on Home Detention Curfew and subsequently served 227 days on his return to lawful custody.

Disorder (Central London)

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action was taken by the Metropolitan police regarding the dispersal of the demonstrators from Trafalgar Square and Whitehall on 1 May; to which areas of London they were dispersed; what policing arrangements were made to ensure a peaceful and orderly dispersal; and if he will make a statement. [121989]

Mr. Straw: The Metropolitan police inform me contingency plans were drawn up to deal with possible disorder. The tactic for this event was to contain any disorder followed by a controlled dispersal. This is what took place from Parliament Square, Trafalgar Square and Whitehall. I understand that protesters from Whitehall and Trafalgar Square were released in small numbers throughout the afternoon and evening to make their way home. Some demonstrators from Parliament Square were escorted to Kennington Park, and a small group of demonstrators congregated in the Strand were escorted to Kennington Park. During the controlled dispersals, police monitored their movements throughout.

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answers of 8 May 2000, Official Report, column 314W, on the disorder in central London on 1 May, what meetings were held prior to 1 May between the Metropolitan police and the Royal Parks Agency regarding the protection of the statues in Parliament Square; who was the most senior Metropolitan police officer present at each such meeting; what advice the Royal Parks Agency received from the Metropolitan police concerning boarding up the statues; who was the most senior Metropolitan police officer who authorised the giving of such advice; and if he will make a statement. [122031]

Mr. Straw: The Metropolitan police inform me that one formal meeting was held with the Royal Parks Agency and several phone calls were made. A member of the central planning team attended the meeting under the directions of the event commander, who on this occasion was Commander Messinger. The available information and intelligence was shared with the Agency.

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answers of 8 May 2000, Official Report, column 314W, on the disorder in central London on 1 May, what meetings were held prior to 1 May between the Metropolitan police and English Heritage regarding the protection of the Cenotaph; who was the most senior Metropolitan police officer present at each such meeting; what advice English Heritage received from the Metropolitan police about boarding up the Cenotaph; who was the most senior Metropolitan police officer who authorised the giving of such advice; and if he will make a statement. [122032]

Mr. Straw: The Metropolitan police inform me that one formal meeting was held with English Heritage and several phone calls made. A member of the police central planning team attended the meeting under the directions of the event commander, who on this occasion was Commander Messinger. The available information and intelligence was shared with English Heritage.

Prisons

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the Government's prisons policy. [122001]

Mr. Straw: It is the Government's policy that the Prison Service should contribute to the wider aims of the criminal justice system by: protecting the public by holding those committed by the courts in a safe, decent and healthy environment; and reducing crime by providing constructive regimes which address offending behaviour, improve educational and work skills and promote law abiding behaviour in custody and after release.

The Prison Service's priorities for 2000–01 are therefore to maintain security and prevent escapes, to deliver improved regimes, including joint approaches with the Probation Service and to manage the prison population safely. The Service is working to improve healthcare, to build a partnership with the Youth Justice Board, to increase prison capacity and to modernise the Service, which includes improving race relations and information technology.

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will commission a full independent evaluation of the methodology of, and conclusions arrived at, in the Comparative Costs of and Performance of Privately and Publicly Operated Prisons 1998–99; what plans he has to issue a qualification of the conclusions arrived at; and if he will make a statement. [121467]

Mr. Boateng: The current methodology was developed by Coopers and Lybrand in 1994–95 and has been updated in subsequent years by Home Office staff. The 1998–99 results show that privately managed prisons cost on average 0 per cent. to 13 per cent. less than comparable publicly managed prisons. The present methodology does not cover prisons which have also been designed, constructed, managed and financed by the private sector (DCMF prisons), three of which have now been fully operational for a year. The Prison Service is therefore commissioning independent consultants to develop a revised methodology which will include DCMF prisons, and an invitation to tender will be issued shortly.

Local Elections

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the turnout in (a) the May 2000 local elections and (b) each of the previous five local elections for each local authority area which conducted pilot projects of alternative voting procedures under the Representation of the People Act 2000; what alternative procedures were used in each case; what plans he has to extend such alternative procedures to all local elections in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement. [121987]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Information about turnout in local authority elections for the previous five local elections for each local authority is not held centrally and we would need to obtain this from local authorities and this would be at disproportionate cost.

A list of the local authorities running pilot schemes at the recent local elections was provided in a reply I gave to my hon. Friend, the Member for Stockport (Ms Coffey) on 21 March 2000, Official Report, columns 486–87W.

Section 10 of the Representation of the People Act 2000, requires local authorities which ran pilot schemes to produce an evaluation report within three months of the election. No decisions on roll-out can be made until this process has been completed.

Young Offenders

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been made to date in halving the time taken from arrest to sentence for persistent young offenders; when he expects it to be achieved; and if he will make a statement. [122036]

Mr. Boateng: In 1996, the average time from arrest to sentence for persistent young offenders was 142 days. The Government are committed to halving this by March 2002. We are making continuing good progress—the national average had fallen to 108 days in 1999.

A copy of the latest figures has been placed in the Library.

Overseas Visitors

Mr. Mudie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether 1 October will be the commencement date for appeal rights for visitor visa refusals. [121713]

Mrs. Roche: We plan that family visitors who have been refused entry clearance will be able to appeal against the refusal from 2 October 2000.

Prohibited Weapons

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prohibited weapons are held by private individuals in England by permission of the Secretary of State. [119870]

Mr. Charles Clarke [pursuant to the reply, 20 April 2000, c. 595W]: The final paragraph of that reply should have read as follows:

There are only eight private individuals in England authorised by the Secretary of State to possess a total of 1,337 prohibited weapons. The vast majority of these are held by one person in one of the most comprehensive private collections of historic firearms in the world. The remaining firearms are held by two people who provide highly specialised firearms training to units of the United Kingdom armed forces; a forensic firearms expert; a lecturer and technical consultant; the owner of a private museum; a professional trapper of dangerous animals who is called in by the police to deal with such animals as escaped big cats; and a researcher into ballistics.

INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 349

SESSION 1999–2000

2nd May—12th May 2000

Printed indexes to Hansard

The volume index is one of three printed indexes to Commons Hansard produced from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Indexing Service (POLIS). It contains references to material in the bound volumes of Hansard. The other indexes produced are:

- The fortnightly index to Hansard. This covers the same date range as the volume index but references are to the column numbering in the daily parts and weekly edition of Hansard.
- The sessional index to Hansard. This contains references to material in the bound volumes for a whole session.

Indexes on the Parliamentary website

Fortnightly, volume and sessional indexes covering material from the beginning of the 1999/2000 session will also appear on the Parliamentary website at http://www.parliament.uk with links to the full text of Hansard.

SCOPE

The indexes include entries covering:

- The content of all material recorded in Hansard, including debates, procedural motions and questions.
- The names of all Members contributing to the Parliamentary business recorded in Hansard.
- The names of some types of Parliamentary business whenever they occur in Hansard. These are 'Ministerial statements', 'Business statements', 'Opposition days' and 'Estimates days'.

ARRANGEMENT

- All headings are in one word-by-word alphabetical sequence, with Members' contribution entries distinguished from other entries by italics.
- Where a Member contributes to Parliamentary business and is the subject of Parliamentary business there are separate contribution and subject entries, the subject entry coming first.
- Entries beginning 'Mac' and 'Mc' are sorted in one sequence as 'Mac'.
- 'St', when abbreviated for Saint, is filed as 'Saint'.
- Numbers are filed as if spelt out, e.g. '10 Downing Street' as if 'Ten Downing Street'.

HEADINGS

Choice of headings

- Specificity—Entries summarise the overall content of a debate or question as specifically as the various POLIS thesauruses allow. For example, Education, Higher education, Universities or the name of a particular university is used depending on the breadth of the item.
- Name headings—Specific entries are included for the names of people, places, institutions, organisations, committees, programmes, initiatives, publications and legislation when these constitute the overall subject of an item.
- Organisations and subjects—Organisation entries are preferred for material about the general performance, administration and staffing of an organisation (for example, United Kingdom Passports Agency, Standards). Subject entries are preferred for what organisations do as part of their duties (for example, Passports, Fees and charges).

Geographical coverage

- Subject headings—Subject headings are assumed to refer to the whole of England, Great Britain or the United Kingdom unless otherwise stated.
- Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales—Material relating to the whole of Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales is indexed under these headings.
- Places within the UK—Material about specific towns, areas and institutions is entered under the name of the specific town, area or institution.
- Foreign countries—Most material relating to foreign countries is collected under the name of that country. Some additional material may be found under the names of—groups of countries, areas within countries, geographical features, place names associated with particular issues, politicians and heads of state, international bodies, and institutions and companies operating in those countries.
- EC/EU material—General material about the European Communities and European institutions as bodies is entered under 'European Communities' and 'EC institutions'. Organisational material about specific communities and institutions is entered under the name of the body, for example 'European Coal and Steel Community' or 'European Parliament'. Material about what the Communities and institutions are doing or propose to do is entered under various subject headings beginning 'EC' such as 'EC environmental policy'.

Parliamentary material and business

- Material about Parliament—This is indexed under 'Parliament', the names of the two Houses, the 'Palace of Westminster' and parts of the Parliamentary estate (such as 'Portcullis House').
- Committees—Material about committees is indexed under 'Committees', types of committee (such as 'Select committees') and the names of individual committees (such as 'Home Affairs Select Committee').
- Parliamentary proceedings/procedures—Material discussing these is indexed under the specific type of proceeding (such as 'Parliamentary questions' or 'Oral questions'), procedure (such as 'Calling of Members') or issue (such as 'Unparliamentary expressions').
- Legislation—Entries for Parliamentary proceedings on bills and statutory instruments are entered under their titles. Where the lead word of the bill or statutory instrument does not provide a full or clear indication of the subject there are additional subject entries when the bill or instrument is debated. For example, debates on the 'Child Support Pensions and Social Security Bill' have entries under 'Pensions' and 'Social security benefits' as well as under the title of the Bill.
- Members' names—These are given in the form by which the Member prefers to be known.
- Speaker and Chair—Contributions by the Speaker and deputies are brought together under the heading 'Speaker and deputies'. Contributions from the chair during Committees of the Whole House are brought together under 'Chairman of Committee of the Whole House'. Significant rulings and statements (as opposed to routine comments) are indicated by the sub-heading 'Rulings and statements' in both cases.

Guidance on headings

- Cross references—'See' references indicate all the material has been entered under another heading. 'See also' references indicate that additional information may be found under another heading.
- Concept thesaurus—A copy of the subject thesaurus to POLIS, listing the concept entries used in the index, is available on the Parliamentary website. A hard copy is available from the Head of the POLIS Unit, House of Commons Library, 1 Derby Gate, London, SW1A 2DG (020 7219 6456).

REFERENCES

- References in the indexes are to columns rather than pages.
- References to debates, but not questions, are accompanied by the date of the item.
- There are separate sequences in Hansard for the material taken on the floor of the House, Westminster Hall sittings and written questions:
  - References consisting of a number by itself indicate material taken on the floor of the House.
  - References ending in 'wh' indicate Westminster Hall sittings.
  - References ending in 'w' indicate written questions.
